Acknowledgements

This evaluation has greatly benefited from the strategic guidance provided by Fidèle Sarassoro, Resident Representative to UNDP DRC, Adama Guindo, former Country Director to UNDP DRC, and Nick René Hartmann, Deputy Country Director (Programmes) to UNDP DRC. Their keenness in ensuring relevance of UNDP's interventions in the DRC was displayed throughout the review exercise.

The evaluation team is also deeply grateful to Fumie Nakamura, Monitoring and Evaluation Specialist in UNDP DRC M&E Unit, who served as a focal point during the review process, and was unfaltering in providing consistent support and guidance to the team. We also owe a special thanks to Programme Assistant Mimi Kiala Nlongo for her sustained administrative support all along the project.

UNDP's field and satellite offices in Kinshasa, Mbandaka, Bikoro, Goma, Beni, Fataki, Mahagi, and Bukavu organized excellent field missions and ensured the overall well-being of the evaluation team experts. From heads of field offices to drivers, all UNDP staff members encountered demonstrated a remarkable commitment to providing us with as much information as possible about UNDP programmes and projects within the historical context of each region.

Most importantly, the evaluation team is heavily indebted to the many respondents (government counterparts, implementing partners, civil society organisations, local and international NGOs, donor partners, and key informants) for providing the required data and information, and engaging in candid discussions on how they view impact and relevance of UNDP's interventions in the DRC. Their sincere insights have been useful in undertaking this assignment successfully.

Executive Summary

This evaluation of UNDP's progress towards achieving programme outcomes for 2008-2012 focuses on the eight outcomes that constitute and structure UNDP's programme as defined in the 2008-2012 Country Programme Document (CPD)¹ for the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). The main focus that was central to the evaluation was to determine to what extent the intended outcomes have been attained, and if they have not been realized, to define the corrective measures that could be taken to achieve them in the near future (2011-2012) or in the longer term (2013-2017). This approach allows project and programme managers to benefit from strategic recommendations to be used when applicable. It also opens up an enriching dialogue on experiences and lessons learned between the various stakeholders, including donors, government, civil society, national institutions, and other relevant actors.

The eight outcomes that are being evaluated are divided into two groups of four outcomes each, respectively focused on poverty reduction and governance. Both areas have guided the development of the overall process covering the selected methodology, the constitution of the evaluation team and the conduct of the research itself.

The four outcomes associated with poverty reduction are laid out opposite:

Outcome P1

National capacities for the framing of policies promoting attainment of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are strengthened.

Outcome P2

The communities are pacified and local economies are revived.

Outcome P3

Response to HIV/AIDS is harmonized and national programme management capacities are strengthened.

Outcome P4

Capacities of national institutions are strengthened to manage the environment and expand energy services, especially to the poor.

¹ Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme and of the United Nations Population Fund, Country programme document for the Democratic Republic of the Congo (2008-2012), DP/DCP/COD/1, 2007, p. 4-5.

The four outcomes associated with good governance are detailed hereafter:

Outcome G5

Citizen participation in the exercise of power is increased and access to public services is improved.

Outcome G6

The national, provincial and local levels of government have improved their capacities to provide public services.

Outcome G7

The public administration is more efficient and reliable and offers services to citizens effectively, equitably and with transparency.

Outcome G8

Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State.

The evaluation team comprised six members, out of which three international consultants and three national consultants were paired together to form three research teams, each focusing on one of the following main issues: poverty pillar outcomes, governance pillar outcomes and bolstering the focus on gender as a cross-cutting issue. Both poverty and governance teams worked relatively independently so that they could concentrate on understanding the nuances of their respective pillars within the Country Office programme. For the field work section, one member of the gender team joined the poverty team and another joined the governance team so that gender-responsiveness could be addressed in the context of both pillars. The gender team members worked closely with the poverty and governance teams in conducting the analysis and drafting the report.

Field work programmes were arranged separately for both teams. The poverty pillar team accompanied by one member from the gender team undertook missions to Ituri District, and to North Kivu and South Kivu Provinces. Similarly the governance team, accompanied by another member of the gender team undertook missions to Ituri District and to North Kivu, South Kivu and Equateur Provinces. In each location, meetings were held with UNDP staff, government officials, civil society members, project staff and project beneficiaries, elected officials, international observers, UN mission and agency personnel, and bilateral and other multilateral agency staff. In some instances, meetings were also arranged with members of the military and the police, and with private entrepreneurs and journalists.

The objective in each of these meetings was to ascertain the extent to which the outcomes for the period 2008-2012 were realized. Pertinent and reliable data were rarely available. The teams relied therefore on primary and secondary source information. Primary information was typically in the form of project planning and reporting documents, strategic papers and correspondence. Most of the primary documentation, including in-house monitoring and evaluation exercises, was limited, with rare exceptions, to confirming or reiterating the positive realization of outcomes. Very few documents and interviewees approached UNDP performance analytically. In order to obtain a nuanced understanding of the programmes, the teams relied on structured and semi-structured interviews that followed strategically structured lines of questioning designed to elicit whether objectives had or had not been met and what were the critical factors.

Overview

This outcome evaluation has sought, sometimes with difficulty, to give an overall perspective on the performance of UNDP with respect to the realization of its objectives. The difficulty is in part a consequence of the exercise itself, divided as it is into eight separate outcomes. It is also in part reflective of UNDP's fragmented and widely dispersed programme. Despite UNDP's overall comprehensive Country Programme Document (CPD), this has not translated into a coherent, unified programme.

The UNDP in the DRC is pulled in different directions and has to respond to different demands at the same time. It is obliged to appeal to donors and has increasingly done so over this programme cycle, implementing programmes at the behest of donors which it might not otherwise undertake. It struggles also to appeal at the same time to its government partners, which results in an approach that differs considerably in commitment and objectives. UNDP must straddle a number of different fences. In addition, the evolving political context to which the UNDP has tried to respond during the course of the programme has dispersed the programme even further.

The UNDP has sought to hold together a diversified programme by introducing a structure with two major pillars: poverty and governance. This structure was supposed to facilitate the organisation of the various programme elements and yet, it has not kept a strong focus. The present programme structure, with its two separate pillars, has perhaps created a further, administrative divide, separating governance programmes from poverty programmes, which in some cases, inhibits the UNDP from benefitting from a potential synergy between components. For example, the programme in support of planning and budgeting for poverty outcomes at the national and provincial levels could have benefited from the programme's governance section to promote decentralization. Because of the administrative divide, both components have operated in parallel, independently from one another.

However, there are still many commendable elements within the programme, which have been successful in bringing about significant results, despite the difficult circumstances under which they have been achieved. These are often under-appreciated, associated as they often are with a diversity of elements that are far less appreciated within a scattered programme. This fragmented and dispersed programme easily detracts from those efforts that have been fruitful. UNDP would benefit from building on those elements that are the most effective, isolate them and reconstruct a more focused programme around them. In the poverty programme, these would include the planning and budgeting tools inspired by MDGs, the social cohesion efforts in the eastern provinces and the potential for microfinance. In the governance programme, these would include the support to the Cour des Comptes (Court of Auditors) in publishing annual reports submitted to the parliament, which has successfully assisted parliamentarians in understanding government finance.

The overall recommendation of the outcome evaluation is to make the programme more cohesive, diminish its involvement in efforts which are not fruitful and focus on those which have had positive results. In doing so, consideration should be given to UNDP's particular strengths within the Paris Declaration Objectives. To accomplish this, the UNDP must be even more responsive to the needs of government and civil society.

Key Evaluation Questions

To lay the foundation for an approach that would be common to all three inquiries, the poverty, governance and gender international and national consultants collaborated in the preparation of evaluation matrices prior to beginning the evaluation, using the same format that included principal questions, principal indicators and sources of data. The matrices served two purposes: 1) to identify the core issues of concern, how they would be addressed and how the relevant information would be obtained; and 2) to ensure a comparable methodology among the three inquiries with the same rigorous approach to identifying indicators.

The matrices were designed to address the five following central evaluation questions:

1. Has progress been made in achieving the results expressed in the outcomes for each of the components? Why and how have the outcomes been achieved, not achieved or partly achieved? What are the major achievements and challenges in each outcome? What exogenous factors have contributed to the realization or non-realization of the outcome?
2. To what extent has UNDP contributed to the promotion of gender equality and women's empowerment at the outcome level? How can the programme be made more effective in 2011-2012 as well as in the next programme cycle 2013-2017?
3. Is the outcome relevant to current national priorities and to the UNDP Country Programme Document? Is the UNDP strategy for each outcome appropriate to the problem(s) the outcome addresses?
4. How effectively and efficiently are the key UNDP projects currently being implemented? Are there any areas that should be modified or that need significant improvement in 2011-2012? In 2013-2017?
5. Is the progress toward realizing the outcomes sustainable? Has ownership by national and provincial authorities been a central consideration in outcome implementation?

Each of the eight outcomes has been assessed with reference to whether these five criteria (key questions) have been fulfilled: i) Fully, ii) Mostly, iii) Partially or iv) Not at all.

Overall, most of the assessments indicate that progress in realizing the objectives, specifically in achieving results, has been partial. Progress has been mostly realized in the support to planning and budgeting processes with a specific focus on the preparation of the Growth and Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper (GPRSP 2). Progress in other outcomes has been judged to be partial. This leaves room for improvement.

Key Findings and recommendations

UNDP has pursued these outcomes in partnership with government and civil society under challenging circumstances. The programming cycle began only five years after the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement of 2003 put an end to two wars and seven years of conflict. In 2008, at the beginning of this programming cycle, the country's economic, physical and social infrastructure was in a state of advanced deterioration that inhibited growth and private sector development. Tensions ran high from the first elections held in 2006. In the course of the programming cycle, armed groups renewed their hostilities with grave humanitarian consequences and with the result that development assistance programmes were largely at a standstill in areas affected by conflict. A global financial crisis reduced exports and public revenues, compromising even further the capacity of the state and its officials to meet the multitude of expectations. In the wake of the financial crisis, UNDP has been increasingly constrained by the lack of guaranteed core funding for development with the consequence that, in order not to reduce significantly its level of involvement in the country, UNDP has assumed the management of programmes which may or may not contribute to its core agenda.

Key findings and recommendations² are divided in two sections, a first treating programme-focused findings with recommendations applicable to all outcomes and a second, relevant to specific outcomes.

Programme Focused Key Findings and Recommendations

Key Finding 1.

Programme Coherence

The elements of the country programme in both pillars do not add up to a clear and coherent strategy, and in some cases, the components fit awkwardly into the pillar to which they belong. Programme activities under the governance rubric operate in parallel with programme activities under the poverty pillar, without taking advantage of the inherent synergy between them.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Revise the structure of the country programme to ensure that the components are sensibly prioritized, that all the anticipated outcomes are of clear strategic value, and that components sharing a strategic domain reinforce each other so that progress toward outcomes can benefit from a more coherent programme.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Ensure the descriptions of outcomes are less grandiose, more feasible and more likely to serve as concrete objectives against which staff, donors and evaluators are able to measure their attainment.
- Reduce the number of outcomes.

Key Finding 2.

Results-based Programme Management

UNDP's efforts to promote 'Managing for Development Results' (MfDR) and the programme approach have not given rise to an effective monitoring and evaluation strategy. Monitoring and evaluation practices and the data in the system of UNDP, such as Atlas and the Enhanced Results-based Management (ERBM) Platform of UNDP Intranet, do not provide information which focus on the realization of outcomes or on how improvements might be made. Indicators, baselines and annual targets of each outcome in ERBM Platform as well as the results framework in the original CPAP 2008-2012 document are not effectively used by UNDP and national partners for the monitoring and reporting of the outcomes. Some outcome definitions and/or indicators are not specific and realistic enough to be used for the actual monitoring, reporting and evaluation. There is not a sufficient understanding of the outcomes among UNDP staff, and this has resulted in a significant delay in the implementation of the original evaluation plan 2008-2012. Outcome monitoring and evaluation have not been harmonized across all the programme units. The information available lacks reliable monitoring data and assessments of progress toward outcomes are not available.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Revise the outcome indicators to ensure indicators assess and report on outcomes and monitor each outcome systematically, at least once a year, based on a harmonized monitoring mechanism across all the programme units.
- Ensure that at least one indicator per outcome is gender specific.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Develop a monitoring and evaluation mechanism that is sensitive to gender for the new results framework of the country programme, based on an approach that is capable of being simply applied by all programme staff and partners in order to promote the realization of outcomes up to the end of the cycle.
- Ensure the integration of gender in the definition of outcomes and outputs as well as in the indicators of outcomes and outputs in the new results framework.

Key Finding 3.Capacity Development

The majority of activities incorporate a capacity building component which is often a combination of material support such as office equipment, including computers and other IT material, training and workshops to discuss approaches, methods, transfer knowledge, and share experiences. In addition, study tours and participation in subject specific conferences or workshops have been offered. At the start of the programme, addressing many of these material basic needs were important in providing a reasonable working environment for staff. In many cases, material support and basic building blocks are in place, but training and other means of transferring knowledge show limited results. Capacity building efforts are a significant part of programme budgets and the impact of capacity building should be made more explicit and visible.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Plan for and include a post capacity building evaluation tool which assesses, for example, how the participant has benefitted from the training offered, how the training has been used in view of the person's tasks and whether the training has improved the performance of the participant or team.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Develop a detailed diagnostic tool that assesses capacity building needs across the programme, which includes timely evaluations of the results and impact of capacity building efforts and includes additional support, such as coaching and on the job training.

Outcome and Gender Specific Key Findings and RecommendationsKey Finding 4.

Outcome P1: National capacities for the framing of policies promoting attainment of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are strengthened.

Tools introduced to enhance the focus on poverty alleviation in the planning and budgeting process are a first step in rationalizing the allocation of national resources. The GPRSP 2 is one of these tools. The challenge is now to entrench these practices within the Ministries of Planning and Finance. The weakest link in this initiative are the provincial government partners whose Priority Action Plans (PAPs), Medium-term Expenditure Frameworks (MTEFs) and other budgeting exercises guide implementation of the national strategy. The initiative requires greater planning and monitoring skills than are presently available.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Strengthen the capacity of provincial bodies implementing the GPRSP 2 to implement and monitor the programmes proposed.
- Oversee an effort to partner private sector firms with provincial planning bodies under the scrutiny of UNDP to sharpen the accounting and planning skills of provincial functionaries.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Initiate a nationwide poverty analysis, with a strong gender equality component, in collaboration with national and local staff in the Ministry of Planning to substantiate and correct the assumptions made in the GPRSP 2.

Key Finding 5.

Outcome P2: The communities are pacified and local economies are revived.

The strategies devised to dismantle non-state armed groups, especially in the North Kivu, South Kivu and Maniema Provinces, have done little to realize their desired outcomes.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Support efforts at regulating the trade in natural resource: expand the pilot trade centres

(centres de négoce) project as a tactic for excluding the participation of non-state armed groups; this is not meant to replace the reinsertion programme for ex-combatants, but rather to complement it.

- Build upon pockets of success within economic recovery and social initiatives in the district of Ituri and adapt them to the context of North and South Kivu; improve the targeting and support the full implementation of the Project for Security, Empowerment and Reintegration of Women in North and South Kivu (PSAR), while also ensuring that the project functions in synergy with the UNDP's Access to Justice Project.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Build a collaborative partnership with private operators in order to impose limits on the commercial activities of armed groups by regulating their commerce in natural resources; UNDP should here initiate partnerships with the private sector in this objective.

Key Finding 6.

Outcome P2: The communities are pacified and local economies are revived.

One of the key elements limiting progress in poverty reduction in Ituri and South Kivu has been the lack of access to capital, or microcredit. Microcredit is available in the marketplace but poor and vulnerable households do not qualify to benefit from it due to a lack of collateral. The positive experience of providing microcredit in Beni has demonstrated the feasibility of UNDP successfully offering microcredit to poor and vulnerable households.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Urge the current UNDP Microfinance Support Programme PASMIF (Programme d'appui au secteur de la microfinance) to devise ways of providing microcredit access to vulnerable and poor households and to support business development.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Introduce microcredit as an integral part of the Community-based recovery programme (Programme de relèvement communautaire), notably in the eastern provinces to support economic growth by making capital available to households at all income levels.

Key Finding 7.

Outcome P4: Capacities of national institutions are strengthened to manage the environment and expand energy services, especially to the poor.

UNDP's concern to focus principally on preparing a strategic national plan to be eligible for international funding diverts attention from making sure that practical applications are pursued in order to ground the projects in concrete realities.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Following discussions with the Ministry of Environment, settle on an approach to national execution that will resolve the present cessation of work on the PANA project (Programme d'action national d'adaptation aux changements climatiques).
- Take measures to perform a gender analysis and to target men and women in the strategy and capacity-building efforts associated with the PANA project. As well, use the existing REDD (Reducing Emissions from Deforestation and Forest Degradation in Developing Countries) Gender Thematic group to integrate gender in the REDD National Strategy.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Embark on a selection of field level initiatives to support the environment programme's theoretical initiatives with practical demonstrations; those initiatives do not need to be extensive, but there must be some indication that the programme is prepared to implement its claims with concrete initiatives.

- Consider the possibility of establishing the environment programme as a separate pillar.

culture of female leadership at the national level and targeted provincial and local levels.

Key Finding 8.

Outcome G5: Citizen participation in the exercise of power is increased and access to public services is improved.

Support to the electoral cycle, including the management of the basket fund to back up the Electoral Cycle Support Project (PACE), has promoted citizen participation in the electoral cycle. Financing the project via a basket fund has allowed UNDP to manage its contribution to the electoral process through an integrated approach, coordinating donor contributions and drawing on, as needed, international advice. Management of the basket fund has been laborious and slow, which has occasionally undermined the convenience and the appropriateness of using the fund for financing the electoral cycle.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Identify obstacles inhibiting the improvement of UNDP's procurement procedures in order to respond to the needs of those managing the electoral cycle in a more timely fashion; provide better support to NGOs to play an effective role in the electoral cycle.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Continue building capacity in the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) to ensure the organizations effectiveness in managing the process.
- Integrate the support to political parties into the support to the Parliament and the Provincial Assemblies and ensure that all parties elected can benefit from UNDP's support.
- Within the PACE project, develop a long-term sub-project focused on the political participation of women and young girls, including the provision of strategic support for the capacity-building of civil society organizations and for a

Key Finding 9.

Outcome G6: The national, provincial and local levels of government have improved their capacities to provide public services.

The advantages of decentralization are clear and UNDP has played an important facilitation role for the Technical Unit for Support of the Decentralization Process (CTAD). Development plans have been elaborated in a participatory manner and these have been an important tool for provincial authorities to provide public services. There are no resources, however, to put them into effect and consequently no impact on beneficiaries.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Organize a Forum II to follow up on Forum I of 2007 and play a facilitation role in identifying those obstacles which are impeding progress on decentralization.
- Build upon and scale-up instances of success in the programme to ensure that the priorities of men and women are enumerated consistently and scaled up to the local and provincial level.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Identify synergies between the administrative and economic governance components and integrate these with the decentralization component if opportune, and ensure that essential reforms with regard to public financial management and public administration are congruent with the decentralization process.

Key Finding 10.

Outcome G7: The public administration is more efficient and reliable and offers services to citizens effectively, equitably and with transparency.

The administrative and economic governance programme is here treated separately from decentralization, and yet, their functions are closely linked. The economic governance programme, as it presently stands, lacks coherence and in spite of different outputs, because of insufficient resources, has had little impact.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Continue to provide support to the Cour des Comptes and analyze the factors that contribute to achieving the outcome; consider using this approach in other governance components.
- Operationalize the Aid and Investment Management Platform (PGAI) and encourage the government to provide a single aid coordination mechanism.
- Accelerate support to ensure that the legal framework with regard to public administration and public finance reforms are concluded.
- Increase UNDP's support to government to encourage improvements in the quality and availability of sex-disaggregated data used by policy makers and planners.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Take advantage of synergies between the administrative and economic governance programme and the decentralization programme in order to advance fundamental reforms in the proposed reforms in public finance and public administration.

Key Finding 11.

Outcome G8: Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State.

UNDP's Access to Justice Project and other similar projects operating in Eastern Congo have measurably increased access to justice for survivors of sexual violence. It has improved the whole penal chain for survivors of sexual violence and also created positive externalities for the whole security and justice system.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Continue the access to justice programme and expand the approach to address the access to justice needs of women and girls and the economic needs after trial, and expand measures to re-integrate them into communities.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Partner with UN Women's initiatives on reparations by taking on an increased role in Women's Access to Justice at the national policy level.

Key Finding 12.

Outcome G8: Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State.

UNDP has been assisting the government with reforms in the justice sector, including: reconstruction of training centres for the police, training police officers, training new judges and access to free justice programmes. In addition, UNDP has introduced an access to justice programme to support victims of sexual violence. Reforms to justice are on-going and some results are substantial, notably in the area of improved police training. The access to justice programme is showing initial results.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Make an inventory of activities undertaken by other donors in the justice reform sector in order to ensure complementarity.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Continue with police training and if possible expand the programme taking into consideration the proximity police approach.
- Expand access to justice programme in numbers of participants and in extent of area served.

Key Finding 13.

Outcome G8: Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State.

Post-brassage and disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) activities have been successful but have not resolved the conflict. In order to make these efforts more sustainable and have a greater impact on conflict prevention, there is a need for the development of medium term poverty alleviation programmes in which the ongoing activities under the current reduction of Small Arms and Light Weapons (SALW) initiative could be integrated.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Include the reduction of SALW initiatives within forthcoming poverty alleviation programmes to support DDR activities.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Transfer all security programmes from the governance pillar to the poverty and conflict reduction programmes.

Key Finding 14.

Gender

Progress toward gender equality and women's empowerment is either partial or non-existent. There is largely limited progress, or 'pockets of success' at the project or micro-project level within outcomes P1 (support for MDG achievement), P2 and P3 (community revitalisation and HIV/AIDS), G6 (local governance and decentralisation), and G8 (security and judicial governance). The weak overall progress is attributable to several determining factors: i) Weak operationalization of the UNDP Gender Strategy and the inability to incorporate gender analysis and strategies in the project development phase; ii) Weak identification of outcome indicators, outputs, and output indicators focused on gender equality and women's empowerment; iii) Insufficient technical expertise to embed gender equality and women's empowerment in key UNDP programmes and projects.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Ensure a consensus on key gender equality priorities, update and operationalize the UNDP Gender Strategy, in consultation with UNDP senior leadership, and in partnership with UN-Women and the United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUSCO); as well, prepare a technical plan to assist UNDP programmatic and cross-cutting units to implement the strategy.
- Build upon and scale-up instances of success in key areas such as gender-responsive budgeting and planning (including the possible secondment of personnel to the Ministry of Planning) (P1), economic revitalisation and social cohesion (P2), HIV/AIDS (P3), decentralisation (G5), and security and judicial governance (P8).
- Develop synergies and common approaches for addressing sexual violence in outcomes P1 (support for the MDGs), P2 (community rehabilitation), P3 (HIV/AIDS), G6 (local governance and decentralisation), G7 (administrative governance) and G8 (post-brassage).

- Ensure that the resources from the PACE Project basket fund are available to the MONUSCO Gender and Elections Team to ensure immediate implementation of planned activities.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- Operationalize a long-term UNDP gender strategy in synergy with and to support the development of the new UNDP 2012-2014 Country Office Gender Strategy. The strategy should be developed in close collaboration with UN Women, with a focus on key strategic domains of intervention for UNDP: gender-responsive budgeting and planning, local governance and decentralisation, economic revitalisation and social cohesion, and access to justice.

- Improve considerably the quality and quantity of gender equality expertise in the Country Office as a whole, and limit the functions of the Gender Unit to quality assurance with respect to gender equality in CO programming.

respect for women staff members in the Country Office.

Key Finding 15.

Gender

In addition to the two existing projects focused on providing services to survivors of sexual and gender-based violence, UNDP should also take a larger leadership role to address sexual violence priorities identified in existing UNDP programmes, with the Ministry of Justice and the Mixed Justice Committee (Thematic Group).

Recommendations for the current programme

- Assume an active role in national-level politics with respect to access to justice for survivors of sexual violence. In particular, increase the capacity of the Ministry of Justice to coordinate initiatives on sexual violence, within the context of existing UNDP support to the Ministry.

Recommendations for planning the next programme cycle

- In collaboration with MONUSCO and UN-Women, develop and disseminate a standardized methodology for integrating sexual violence prevention and response in all UNDP programmes.

Key Finding 16.

Gender

There is a significant lack of gender balance and respect for women staff members at all levels of the UNDP Country Office in the DRC. Progress in this area is greatly needed so that UNDP can model the changes it aims to inspire with respect to gender equality in its programming.

Recommendations for the current programme

- Take immediate measures at the institutional level to address the lack of gender balance and

Introduction

Context and Description of the Programme

This evaluation of UNDP's progress towards achieving programme outcomes³ for 2008-2012 focuses on the eight outcomes that constitute and structure UNDP's programme in the DRC. These eight outcomes are built around two strategic domains or pillars of governance and poverty reduction. Both areas are interconnected with the following two major objectives: to promote the emergence of a rule of law under which human rights are guaranteed; and to contribute to an economic recovery that is sufficient to improve household livelihood security. The main focus that was central to the outcome evaluation has been to determine to what extent these intended outcomes have been attained and, if they have not been realized, to define the corrective measures that could be taken to achieve them within the current programming cycle (2011-2012) or in the course of a subsequent programming cycle (2013-2017). These orientations and their components comply with the Security Council Resolution 1325, which emphasized the link between these two strategic domains and the prevention of conflict, the restoration of communities and the promotion of gender equality.

UNDP has pursued these outcomes⁴ under challenging circumstances. The programming cycle began only five years after the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement of 2003 put an end to two wars and seven years of conflict. In 2008, at the beginning of this programming cycle, the country's economic, physical and social infrastructure was in a state of advanced deterioration that inhibited growth and private sector development. Tensions ran high from the first elections held in 2006. In the course of the programming cycle, armed groups renewed their hostilities with grave humanitarian consequences, and with the result that development assistance programmes were largely at a standstill in areas affected by conflict. A global financial crisis reduced exports and public revenues, compromising even further the capacity of the state and its officials to meet the multitude of expectations. In the wake of the financial crisis, UNDP has been increasingly constrained by the lack of guaranteed core funding for development with the consequence that, in order not to reduce significantly its level of involvement in the country, UNDP has assumed the management of programmes which may or may not contribute to its core development agenda.

Linked to the lengthy period of conflict have been uniquely low levels of human development. The national MDG report reveals high levels of poverty. At the beginning of the programming cycle, an estimated 71 per cent of the population lived below the poverty line, 31 per cent of children under five years suffered from chronic malnutrition and the net enrollment rate at the primary grades was of 52 per cent.⁵ These national indicators reflect the considerable burden of poverty borne by the population.

Justification and Scope of the Evaluation

The evaluation adheres to the policy of UNDP to conduct an evaluation of outcomes⁶ and to measure the progress of the country programme towards achieving the results in the final year of a programming cycle.

It directs its attention to two groups of four orientations each, in sum a total of eight outcomes which have guided the methodology, the constitution of the evaluation team and the conduct of the research.

The four outcomes associated with poverty reduction are as follows:

- Outcome P1: National capacities for the framing of policies promoting attainment of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are strengthened.

- Outcome P2: The communities are pacified and local economies are revived.
- Outcome P3: Response to HIV/AIDS is harmonized and national programme management capacities are strengthened.
- Outcome P4: Capacities of national institutions are strengthened to manage the environment and expand energy services, especially to the poor.

The four outcomes associated with good governance are as follows:

- Outcome G5: Citizen participation in the exercise of power is increased and access to public services is improved.
- Outcome G6: The national, provincial and local levels of government have improved their capacities to provide public services.
- Outcome G7: The public administration is more efficient and reliable and offers services to citizens effectively, equitably and with transparency.
- Outcome G8: Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State.

In line with the overriding UNDP institutional commitment to achieve tangible advances in gender equality, the evaluation team accords specific attention to the distinct needs and priorities of men and boys, and women and girls, ⁶ For a definition of outcomes, or 'effects', this evaluation relies on UNDP's Handbook on Planning, Monitoring and Evaluating for Development Results, New York, 2009. Outcomes describe the intended changes in development conditions that result from the interventions of governments and other stakeholders, including international development agencies such as UNDP. They are medium-term development results created through the delivery of outputs and the contributions of various partners and non-partners. Outcomes provide a clear vision of what has changed or will change globally or in a particular region, country or community within a period of time. They normally relate to changes in institutional performance or behaviour among individuals or groups. Outcomes cannot normally be achieved by only one agency and are not under the direct control of a project manager.

within the context of evaluating the realization of the poverty and governance outcomes. The poverty and governance evaluation teams worked hand-in-hand with the gender team to develop and implement an integrated evaluation framework to capture whether key programme stakeholders have seized critical windows of opportunity to ensure UNDP gender-responsiveness in UNDP programming.

Methodology

The methodology has been designed to perform assessments of eight separate programme outcomes, each with a diversity of projects and objectives. The methodology is characterized here with reference to four phases, each with its specific activities and outputs (see Table 1).

Desk review. The literature provided was voluminous and repetitive and much of it had only marginal relevance to determining the realization of outcomes. The evaluation team conducted a triage, identifying those documents that were the most relevant to the outcome evaluation objectives and extracting from these the more pertinent documents, key issues and questions.

Based on this review, an evaluation matrix was compiled by the gender, poverty and governance specialists. The matrix developed by the project team is found in Annex 8. Refinements of the matrix were made as the research progressed and as key questions became clearer. The evaluation matrix included in Annex 8 is the matrix drafted originally. It is lengthy, and the length is an indication of the complexity of the task and the efforts of the evaluation team to come to the field fully prepared.

In order to lay the foundation for an approach that would be common to all three inquiries, the poverty, governance and gender international consultants collaborated in preparing this matrix prior to beginning the work, using the same format that included principal questions, principal indicators and sources of data. This served two purposes: i) to identify the core issues of concern, how they would be addressed and how the relevant information would be obtained; and ii) to ensure a comparable methodology among the three inquiries with the same rigorous approach to identifying indicators and sources. Each matrix was shared among the international and national consultants, comments were solicited and changes were made.

The questions, sub-questions, indicators and sources provided in the evaluation matrix were designed to interrogate the outcomes with reference to the five evaluation criteria laid out hereafter, in association with other specific questions. The evaluation matrix has been designed to facilitate interaction with respondents and interlocutors. It has not been organized along the lines of these evaluation criteria; however, these evaluation criteria are both implicit and thematic to the matrix, and to the questioning which has been based on it.

Results Achievement. Has progress been made in achieving the results expressed in the outcomes for each of the component? Why and how have the outcomes been achieved, not achieved or partly achieved? What are the major achievements and challenges in each outcome? What exogenous factors have contributed to the realization or non-realization of the outcome?

Gender responsiveness. To what extent has UNDP contributed to the promotion of gender equality and women's empowerment at the outcome level? How can the programme be made more effective in 2011-2012 as well as in the next programme cycle 2013-2017?

Relevance. Is the outcome relevant to current national priorities and to the UNDP Country Programme Document? Is the UNDP strategy for each outcome appropriate to the problem(s) the outcome addresses?

Efficiency. How efficiently are the key UNDP projects currently being implemented? Are there any areas that should be modified or that need significant improvement in 2011-2012? In 2013-2017?

Sustainability. Is the progress toward realizing the outcomes sustainable? Has ownership by national and provincial authorities been a central consideration in outcome implementation?

The evaluation team consulted a wide range of documents (Annex 6), which were mostly produced within the UNDP: annual reports, evaluations, work plans and summary of results. These documents provided a perspective that is understandably partial to the UNDP. Other sources were also used, such as books and articles which gave an objective background to events pertaining to the dynamics of pacification, reducing sexual violence and economic recovery. These were essential in assessing whether the UNDP programmes were feasible and appropriate to the situation. Documents produced by prominent civil society organizations such as Oxfam GB and the International Crisis Group were consulted in order to triangulate findings, provide insights into the rationale for international interventions, and in particular, for their occasional critical and often incisive views on the efficacy of UN programming.

Consultations with key stakeholders in Kinshasa. Interviews were arranged by the evaluation task manager for six consecutive days, sometimes carrying into the evening, leaving little time for interaction and planning among team members. The evaluation team nevertheless collaborated as much as possible under the circumstances to compare notes and to highlight key findings and concerns.

For the Kinshasa consultations and site visits that followed, the three international consultants were paired with the three national consultants to form three teams: one team carrying out research into poverty pillar outcomes, one team focusing on governance pillar outcomes, and a team devoted to looking into gender issues. Both poverty and governance teams worked relatively independently so that they could concentrate on understanding the nuances of their respective pillars within the Country Office programme. One member of the gender team joined the poverty team and another joined the governance team so that gender-responsiveness could be addressed in the context of each of the pillars.

Interviews were held during this phase in two principal ways. The most common was group consultations in which the evaluation team met with two or more individuals for discussions on the thematic pillars as a whole, on one or another of the components, and on specific projects. Since the group consultations, which had been arranged in advance, did not always yield in-depth understandings, members of the outcome evaluation team requested one-on-one consultations with specific individuals and these, in many cases, were more productive.

The result of this phase was an inception report which, after some amendments, was accepted by UNDP senior management.

Consultations and site visits in field offices. Field work programmes were arranged separately for both poverty and governance teams. The poverty pillar team accompanied by one member from the gender team undertook missions to Ituri District, and to North Kivu and South Kivu Provinces. Similarly the governance team, accompanied by another member of the gender team undertook missions to Ituri District, and to North Kivu, South Kivu and Equateur Provinces. In each location, meetings were held with UNDP staff, government officials, civil society members, project staff and project beneficiaries, elected officials, international observers, UN mission and agency personnel, and bilateral and other multilateral agency staff. In some instances, meetings were also arranged with members of the military and the police, and with private entrepreneurs and journalists.

Field office consultations involved a diversity of research techniques.

Document review. In each location, new documentation was made available in the form of project planning and reporting documents, strategic papers and correspondence. Most of the primary documentation, including in-house monitoring and evaluation exercises, were limited, with rare exceptions, to reiterating the positive realization of outcomes. Very few documents approached UNDP performance analytically.

Group consultations. Group consultations were arranged between the evaluation team and UNDP staff in locations where the UNDP presented accomplishments in the past four years and had specific plans for the next programming cycle.

One-on-one structured interviews. Where possible, individual consultations were arranged with UNDP staff, NGO staff, government officials and others. These were done on the initiative of the evaluation team. Structured questions permitted probing on key issues. They were most useful in eliciting whether objectives had or had not been met and what were the critical factors.

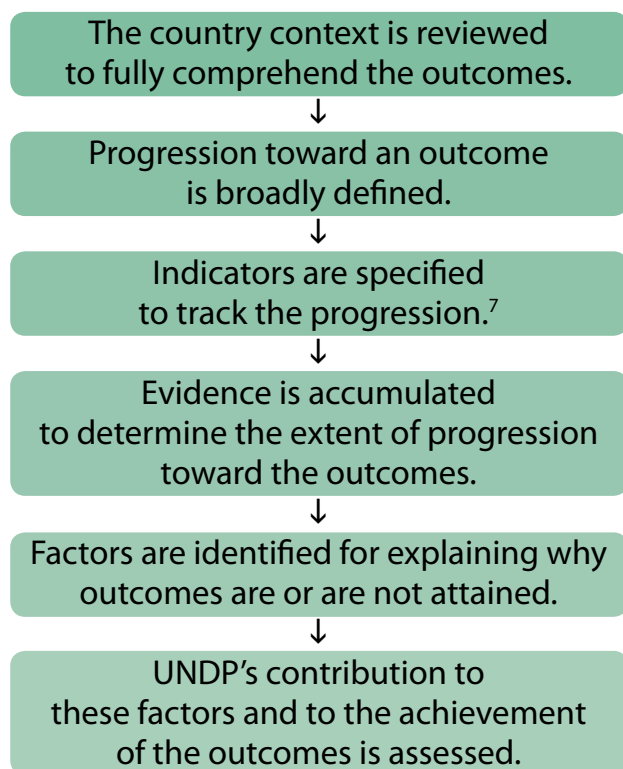

Site visits. In every location, site visits to project sites were arranged where evaluation team members viewed project outputs and discuss with local community groups and other beneficiaries what, in their view, were the outputs and outcomes.

At the conclusion of the site visits, team members were able to come to preliminary conclusions and recommendations and on the basis of these, prepared a presentation/debriefing to UNDP senior management in Kinshasa on 3 June 2011.

Analysis. The analytical challenge has been to present assessments on eight separate outcomes in a coherent fashion. This was accomplished in the following ways.

1. Frequent interaction was encouraged and practiced among all team members, national and international, in order to ensure that gender be fully integrated in the analysis of the poverty and governance outcomes, and that poverty and governance teams be fully aware of each other's analytical directions.
2. An identical format was agreed upon and followed for the presentation of each of the outcome sections to ensure that they covered the same topics in the same order.
3. In the course of the evaluation, members of the team identified those factors which uniquely contributed to or limited the attainment of objectives. A list was compiled at the conclusion and those which uniquely contributed or limited realization are compiled in the section: Contributing and Limiting Factors. They were identified as part of the evaluation process, not in advance; consequently, it has not been possible to quantify their impact or render their relevance in a more precise fashion. Four of the limiting factors have served as a basis for some of the key findings and recommendations included in the Executive Summary and in the Performance Summary, Conclusions and Recommendations section.
4. A common ranking scheme was adopted for assessing the extent to which all outcomes were achieved and, more specifically, for assessing the extent to which all outcome areas adhered to the five central evaluation criteria: results achievement, gender responsiveness, relevance, efficiency, and sustainability. The scheme assessed the outcomes with reference to whether those five key questions have been fulfilled i) Fully, ii) Mostly, iii) Partially or iv) Not at all. The ranking scheme was applied to each of the evaluation criteria in assessing outcomes in order to ensure comparability. The ranking scheme accomplishes two purposes. It provides the reader with an overall image of programme performance without having to go through the entire report. It also allows comparability across outcomes so that the performance of one outcome can be compared to that of another. Results are provided in section 13.
5. The experience of the evaluators as well as lessons from survey literature recommends a performance system of four separate rankings. Five makes the distinctions too fine and three not fine enough. There is an element of judgment involved, clearly, but this was minimized by assigning a ranking following agreement among team members.
6. It should be pointed out that those rankings were devised by independent experts in poverty and governance. Therefore, it would have been impossible to anticipate that most of the rankings would be similar. The extent to which outcomes were realized was judged to be partial in all but one case, which meant there was very little variation in the assessments. The evaluation team found this curious but since the results had been arrived at objectively, it would have been inappropriate to change them after they had been made. The reality is that the performance of UNDP with respect to most of the outcomes has indeed been partial in the estimation of the outcome evaluation team.

The logic of outcome evaluations. An outcome evaluation is said frequently to work backwards from conventional project evaluations, that is, to begin with the end point, or what UNDP aspires to achieve, and determine the extent to which UNDP inputs and contributions are appropriate. The following logic has guided this inquiry's approach to reviewing outcomes, gathering information, assessing progress toward an outcome and making recommendations:

Outcome Evaluation and the Assessment of Development Results (ADR). In 2011, UNDP DRC Country Office conducted the Assessment of Development Results (ADR), another external independent evaluation managed by the UNDP Evaluation Office. The ADR and this outcome evaluation were conducted by two different external evaluation teams and administered separately to ensure the independence of both evaluations. However, in order to avoid duplication of effort and minimize ambiguity among partners, the two evaluation teams were closely coordinated in practice. As a part of this effort, the ADR team leader joined the meetings/interviews with high-level stakeholders and UNDP staff in Kinshasa, in early May 2011, to ensure that one group of evaluators asks a set of questions only once. The debriefing session to the key stakeholders was also organized jointly with the ADR team at the end of July. For more detailed information the coordination mechanism between the two evaluations, please refer to the TOR.

Limitations

There were some inevitable limitations that hindered the project. The logistics of visiting each of the investments was daunting, especially during the rainy season in the eastern part of the country, where insecurity and the presence of armed groups made field observations risky. Some critical sites were not visited because of these constraints. It is a particular feature of the UNDP programme that each of the provinces (or districts) targeted by these outcomes has constructed its programme differently, either to adapt to the staffing resources available, or to comply with donors requirements, or even, to some extent, because the different localities pose somewhat different problems. The evaluation has attempted to take all these variations into account. Therefore, it was quite challenging to aim at achieving a synthesis as efficiently as possible.

Structure of the Report

The core of the report consists of eight sections, treating four poverty pillar outcomes and four governance pillar outcomes. On the initial page in each of these sections is a boxed summary of five key questions dealing with: progress toward the realization of the outcome, relevance of the outcome, its responsiveness to gender equality, sustainability of the strategy, and its implementation and the efficiency in achieving the outcome. A brief section summarizing the factors which have influenced, generally negatively, the attainment of these outcomes, precedes these eight core sections. Following the eight sections is a summary of observations on the responsiveness of the programme to gender equality. This is followed by a summary of the programme's performance, broad conclusions and a list of recommendations.

⁷ It should be noted that the existing outcome indicators from the CPAP document and the ERBM Platform along with the existing outcome indicators developed by the Country Office were of very limited usefulness. It is for this reason that the evaluation team was obliged to specify its own indicators.

Contributing and Limiting Factors

This outcome evaluation assesses the extent to which the programme has realized broad objectives. Outcome evaluations do not assess project level objectives or the attainment of project level results;⁸ they focus instead on larger issues, essentially the problems which projects are supposed to contribute to solving. Outcome evaluations are, characteristically, more demanding than project evaluations in that they inquire whether programmes contribute to meeting challenging goals.

The case of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) is particularly difficult. Given the absence of an enabling environment and the considerable limitations which are discussed throughout the report, reaching these outcomes has been difficult. Achieving modest outcomes in the DRC would be difficult in itself, but the ambitious way these outcomes are defined makes attainment the more so. These outcomes have included, for example: the pacification and economic recovery among communities in conflict affected areas (outcome P2); improvement of access to public services by decentralizing their delivery (outcome G6); and reduction of armed violence along with the protection of citizens by the state (outcome G8). Those three outcomes clearly underscore the scope of the task assigned to the UNDP.

For the most part, the evaluation discusses each outcome with reference to the outcomes' own objectives as they are defined. Findings are given for each of these outcomes along with recommendations. The factors that have affected the realization of outcomes over the 2008-2012 programming cycle are ones that are particular to specific poverty or governance components. The report has been unavoidably segmented in this way, addressing each outcome as a separate entity, and identifying each contributing element towards the realization of UNDP assigned objectives.

This analysis provides, on the other hand, a broader view. Included here are factors that apply more generally, which have contributed, in various ways, to the realization of all the outcomes. These are the factors that unify the evaluation of the programme, which combine to facilitate or limit the achievement of more than a single outcome. Their precise impact is difficult to quantify. They are nevertheless essential. The following are a distillation of factors noted by respondents in their efforts to account for why outcomes have or have not been attained. In this way, this section provides the reader with some essential explanatory factors, both contributing and limiting, as a context for reviewing each of the outcome sections that follow.

8 UNDP (2002). Guidelines for Outcome Evaluations, UNDP Evaluation Office.

Contributing Factors

Partnership with the Government of the DRC.

It is widely believed that UNDP's success in building a relationship of trust with the Government of the DRC is its strongest asset. It is one of the principal reasons that large donors are attracted to the UNDP as a vehicle for administering complex programmes. Many of UNDP successes, as for example the completion of the GPRSP 2 or the introduction of measures to end impunity for gender based sexual violence, is attributable to an enduring relationship between the UNDP and the government.

UNDP Neutrality. A related factor bearing on UNDP's success in working in close collaboration with the Government, and one that is frequently mentioned, has been its neutrality on both national and international political issues. According to many respondents, the UNDP's focus is primarily on human rights and not on politics.

Experience in programme coordination. The administration of humanitarian and development assistance in politically volatile areas has become a trademark of UNDP, and as a result, has turned the institution into an ideal vehicle for administering aid funds from various donors. For the most part, donors, NGOs and bilateral agencies have confidence in UNDP's capacity to administer their humanitarian and development resources and have expressed the desire that UNDP plays an even stronger and more effective role.

Field offices. The existence of field offices continues to be a unique asset in the UNDP's ability to administer complex community-based programmes in diverse areas of the country. UNDP's presence in North Kivu, South Kivu, Ituri and Équateur, the four provinces covered by this evaluation, has been a significant factor in delivering complex humanitarian and development programming in these areas. Any reduction in field office presence will detract from the efficacy of programmes in these areas.

Limiting Factors

Programme coherence. The present configuration of outcomes is not logically consistent and includes elements too diverse to effectively reinforce each other. The definition given to the outcomes of the poverty pillar and its component is too broad to specify concretely what has to be accomplished, which is symptomatic of the lack of logical consistency; instead of defining UNDP's actual competence, they cast the net widely of what UNDP, if given the opportunity, might do. This covers a diversity of elements. For instance, the poverty's pillar refers to an admixture of programmes, lumped together under the heading of Community Recovery, which includes a collection of conflict mitigating programmes, social services, some police training, building schools, enterprise training and microcredit. The rationale for including conflict reduction in DRC's eastern provinces along with economic recovery rests on the assumption that various economic stimulus activities will divert rebels from their interest in combat within armed groups. Ending conflict in the eastern provinces is probably not well served by associating this important and complex objective with an eclectic collection of economic recovery programmes. Conflict reduction should be singled out to be given the proper attention that it deserves.

Microcredit likewise is too important as a poverty reduction tool to be represented as merely one among many options in an eclectic economic recovery programme. It too deserves greater priority than presently. By contrast, the status given to the outcome associated with HIV/AIDS seems more prominent than is warranted, and it detracts from the coherence of the pillar.

A similar critique could be applied to the governance pillar. The questionable coherence in both pillars has certainly an historical justification but this justification should now be reviewed and a more coherent and logical structure should be developed for UNDP's programme in the DRC.

UNDP procedures. Procedures for the procurement of goods and services and other internal UNDP mechanisms are slow. This has caused delays and at times frustration for implementing partners, particularly those who manage programmes in government. It has resulted as well in beneficiary frustration. This slowness affects in particular time sensitive activities, which are vital to stability, peace and reconciliation. Slow procurement of materials and services in a DDR programme may hamper effective implementation when it is urgent to ensure as quickly as possible that armed groups are disarmed, demobilized and reintegrated. Another example is assistance to legal entities preparing cases of sexual violence. These cases are normally processed within a maximum time frame of 4 months. In this context, delayed procedures could result in inadequate case file preparation, leading to case rejection.

Defining outcomes. Outcomes have often been identified in broad and unrealistic terms. The definition of objectives in such broad terms renders these critical statements of objectives nearly ineffective for giving a practical sense of what the programme seeks to do. The difference in scale and impact between an output and an outcome is considerable and this factor may explain why most outcomes are only partially achieved. Furthermore, most activities include a regional or provincial component, and therefore cannot be achieved in total across the DRC. Yet the outcomes do not take this into account. The definition of outcome G8 is illustrative: “armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State” appears overly optimistic since the state has had little influence in reducing violence in the eastern part of the country over the past decade.

The inclination to define objectives, even at the component and project level, in uniquely broad terms detracts from making the elements in a programme logically consistent and realistically achievable. In some cases, they are not. Defining outcomes, at the outcome, output and project levels in a more concrete, practical fashion contributes to logical consistency of components and the feasibility of attaining objectives.

Mid-cycle resource reductions. The financial situation has changed in the course of implementation. Resources available for the programming cycle 2008-2012, including TRAC, BCPR and Non-TRAC resources, all diminished over the programming period necessitating changes in the nature and scope of implementation. This required extensive adjustments, some of which compromised the realization of outcomes.

The case of the Community Recovery component is illustrative of this problem. In 2008, this component and its associated outcome P2 counted on a budget of approximately US$ 230 millions for the programming cycle, but by mid-2010, it became clear that the component would receive hardly a quarter of this amount. Two factors were responsible. The international financial crisis led donors to reduce their allotments to United Nations agencies; and donors began to seriously question the added value of investing in development through the UNDP. In outcome P2, as in others, the challenge was to do more with considerably less.⁹ This meant focusing on some elements and not others. It meant reducing the number and size of investments, in some cases so drastically that efficiency was compromised and objectives could not be reached.

Table 2 gives the total resources planned for the poverty and governance programmes between 2008 and 2012 along with the amount actually spent by July 2011. It also shows the percentage of the original planned resources that were not spent or not available for programme expenditures in July 2011. Nearly three-quarters of the planned resources were either not available or not spent in July 2011, almost three-quarters into the programming cycle. This has had an unavoidable and significant impact on the efficiency and impact of the programmes.

UNDP responded with a number of strategies. One was to collaborate with other agencies in joint projects, pooling resources to achieve a broader impact. Another has been to rely, more than previously, on national civil society partners for executing programmes. Another has been to encourage national counterparts to assume a greater role in project implementation. Budget reductions and the consequent changes in implementation strategies have had a negative impact overall on realizing objectives.

Communication with partners. Government officials complain they are not fully informed about the projects, budgets and implementation strategies. This negatively impacts their performance. The Conseil Suprême de la Magistrature (Supreme Council of Juricature) provides a case in point. The Conseil Suprême de la Magistrature was informed of the allocation of a US$ 40,000 budget for the training of magistrates candidates. Members were subsequently told that approximately US$ 30,000 had been used for this purpose but they knew nothing about what happened to the remaining funds. It was assumed they would be able to use the remainder for other activities, goods or services but there were no specific assurances about it. Sharing financial information and responsibility is a critical element in building functioning partnerships.

Persistence of conflict. In the Kivu and Maniema provinces where UNDP has maintained a presence, continuing conflict and insecurity has closed off humanitarian space and required cancellations or delays in some programming. During this programming cycle, there have been three anti-FDLR operations in the east: Umoja Wetu, Kimia II and Amani Leo. Each of these has had unpleasant consequences for civilians and has rendered large areas off-limits for development activities. Mai-Mai groups have thrived as the efforts to diminish the FDLR continue. The military integration of certain armed groups has fallen short of expectations¹⁰ and DDR programmes seem to have little impact. Over a million Congolese are still displaced by violence. Continued conflict has limited the capacity of UNDP programming to realize its objectives. Programmes to reduce conflict in the East are not accomplishing their objective and this has been a factor in limiting access to UNDP governance and poverty programming in areas where the conflict contributes to continuing insecurity.

¹⁰ International Crisis Group (2010). Congo: No Stability in Kivu Despite a Rapprochement with Rwanda, Africa Report No. 165, November 2010, p. 6.

Lack of credibility in the Government's stabilization programming.

In June 2009, the government signaled its intention to assume an active role in reducing conflict by establishing the Stabilization and Reconstruction Programme for Post-conflict Zones (STAREC). STAREC had the potential of becoming a viable partner for UNDP, a source of expertise, funding and national party commitment. It has been a disappointment and a limiting factor in UNDP's efforts to restore peace in eastern provinces. The government has made little if any financial commitment. Donor contributions have understandably been far less than expected. Key STAREC programmes such as the revival of economic activities have received no financial contributions. The component to address sexual violence, by mid-2010, had received less than US$ 5 millions. Integration of ex-combatants has not been supported. The credibility of the government's claim to support whole-heartedly a cessation to conflict has inevitably been questioned and what emerged originally as a promising government partnership in both the governance and poverty pillar programmes now seems very much less so.

Government capacity and UNDP response.

Capacity building constitutes an important theme for the country programme. Government has often stated that donors, including UNDP, should use more national staff. Yet UNDP and other donors claim that government capacity is weak. This divergence of views leads to misunderstandings between the partners. UNDP provides incentives for government officials to participate in its activities; in many cases, however, UNDP and other donors compete for the same staff resources. UNDP and the donor community need to address this issue (cf. above re transaction costs), since effective cooperation with government is a pre-condition for the effective implementation of the activities of UNDP and other donors.

There is no long term vision or strategy for capacity building within UNDP, the government and the wider donor community. In many cases, capacity building has been a combination of training, material support, organizing workshops and meetings without sufficient upstream diagnoses of the nature of the need. The nature of the latter will vary according to a ministry or sector so that a broad brush will not work and therefore not meet the expectation of the donors or the government

The monitoring and evaluation function.

UNDP's efforts to promote 'Managing for Development Results' (MfDR) have not given rise to an effective monitoring and evaluation strategy. Monitoring and evaluation practices and the data in the system of UNDP, such as Atlas and the Enhanced Results-based Management (ERBM) Platform of UNDP Intranet, do not provide information which focuses on the realization of outcomes or how improvements might be made. Indicators, baselines and annual targets of each outcome in ERBM Platform as well as the results framework in the original CPAP 2008-2012 document are not effectively used by UNDP and national partners for the monitoring and reporting of the outcomes. Some outcome definitions and/or indicators are not specific and realistic enough to be used for the actual monitoring, reporting and evaluation. The different indicators that have been developed are generally of a quantitative nature, such as the number of laws promulgated or meetings held. This neglects the importance of the quality of results and does not contribute substantially to understanding the outcome of UNDP assistance.

There is not a sufficient understanding of the outcomes among UNDP staff, and this has resulted in a significant delay in the implementation of the original evaluation plan 2008-2012. Outcome monitoring and evaluation have not been harmonized across all the programme units. The information available lacks reliable monitoring data, and assessments of progress toward outcomes are not available.

Programme approach. Frequent reference is made to a 'programme approach' even if there is little evidence of efforts to put a programme approach in place. A multiplicity of projects continues to characterize the UNDP strategy. There appears to be a real need for rationalizing and focusing this multiplicity of projects. Some components have widely dispersed activities, as many as 100 in some cases. Project-based funding mechanisms contribute to a lack of coherence and a dispersal of activities and one of the consequences is that the government has difficulty keeping track.

Overview

This outcome evaluation has sought, sometimes with difficulty, to give an overall perspective on the performance of UNDP with respect to the realization of its objectives. This difficulty is in part a consequence of the exercise itself, divided as it is into eight separate outcomes. It is also in part reflective of UNDP's fragmented and widely dispersed programme. Despite UNDP's overall comprehensive Country Programme Document, this has not translated into a coherent, unified programme.

The UNDP in the DRC is pulled in different directions and has to respond to different demands at the same time. It is obliged to appeal to donors and has increasingly done so over this programme cycle, implementing programmes at the behest of donors which it might not otherwise undertake. It struggles also to appeal at the same time to its government partners, which results in an approach that differs considerably in commitment and objectives. UNDP must straddle a number of different fences. In addition, the evolving political context to which UNDP has tried to respond in the course of the programme has dispersed the programme even further.

The UNDP has sought to hold together a diversified programme by introducing a structure with two major pillars: poverty and governance. This structure was supposed to facilitate the organisation of the various elements of the programme and yet, it has not proven to keep a strong focus. The present programme structure, with its two separate pillars, has perhaps created a further, administrative divide, separating governance programmes from poverty programmes, which in some cases, inhibits the UNDP from benefitting from a potential synergy between components. For example, the programme in support of planning and budgeting for poverty outcomes at the national and provincial level could have benefited from the governance programme to promote decentralization. Because of the administrative divide, both components have not benefitted from the potential synergy.

However, there are many elements of the programme which are commendable and which function well with significant results, particularly given the difficult circumstances under which they have been achieved. These are often under-appreciated, associated as they often are with a diversity of elements that are far less appreciated within a scattered programme. This fragmented and dispersed programme easily detracts from those efforts that have been fruitful. UNDP would benefit from building on those elements that are the most effective, isolate them and reconstruct a more focused programme around them.

In the poverty programme, these would include the planning and budgeting tools inspired by the MDGs, the social cohesion efforts in the eastern provinces, and the potential for microfinance. In the governance programme, these would include the support to the Cour des Comptes in publishing annual reports submitted to the parliament, which has successfully assisted parliamentarians in understanding government finance.

The overall recommendation of the outcome evaluation is to make the programme more cohesive, diminish its involvement in efforts which are not fruitful, and focus on those which have had positive results. In doing so, consideration should be given to UNDP's particular strengths within the Paris Declaration Objectives. To accomplish this, the UNDP must be even more responsive to the needs of government and civil society.

Poverty Pillar

Outcome P2

The communities are pacified and local economies are revived.

Key Findings

To what extent has progress been made in realizing the outcome?

While some progress has been made to reduce conflict in Ituri District, conflict continues unabated in North and South Kivu. Likewise, while some progress has been made in promoting economic recovery in North Kivu, progress is less in South Kivu and Ituri. Overall progress in realizing this outcome is partial.

Have the programmes associated with the outcome been designed and executed to promote gender equality?

The gender responsiveness of the microfinance component is evident in its gender-specific indicators and its reporting on gender equality. It has also provided technical support for the draft microfinance law, which includes provisions on gender equality. In contrast, the social cohesion and economic recovery initiatives have not had a significant impact on ensuring an active role for women and on the balance of power between men and women. The Noyaux pacifistes des mamans (NPMs) initiatives in the Ituri District are an exception. The microfinance activities in Beni are another exception where women constitute the majority of participants. Men and women are otherwise, however, limited by gender stereotyping and access to credit in economic recovery initiatives. Overall, this aspect of the outcome has been partially realized.

Is the outcome relevant to the UNDP country programme document and policies of the national authorities?

Both the Country Programme Document and the government's DSCR 2 accord the highest priority to conflict reduction and pro-poor economic growth. This aspect of the outcome is fully realized.

Is the outcome sustainable and/or owned by the government?

Government endorses the programmes enthusiastically but neither provincial governments nor the STAREC programme is prepared to make a financial commitment. This aspect of the outcome is partially realized.

Has the outcome been achieved in the most efficient manner?

In part for budgetary reasons and in part by virtue of programme design, components of the economic recovery programmes lack a synergy that would have increased programme efficiency. The conflict reduction programmes in North and South Kivu have done little to reduce conflict. This aspect of the outcome has been partially realized.

Progress Toward the Outcome

This outcome is typically referred to as community recovery and includes a large assortment of initiatives. They are far too numerous to be treated in any depth in this outcome evaluation. Community recovery strives to achieve two goals: conflict reduction and economic recovery. Components of the economic recovery programme include training individuals (ex-combatants, female survivors of war and sexual violence, indigent and vulnerable persons) in professional skills, providing cattle to families that have little household income and reconstructing markets which have been destroyed in the fighting, to mention only a few. Conflict reduction includes programmes to reconcile inter-ethnic conflict, to organize traditional chiefs to deal with conflict, to support peace-promoting radios and offer rebel soldiers income earning activities that will draw them away from fighting.

There is little doubt that many of the community recovery programmes are worthwhile. Pockets of beneficiary households are certainly better off. A few soldiers have abandoned their career as rebels even though the overall number has remained largely the same and the civil unrest continues as before. The question that arises in an outcome evaluation is how many of the programmes are really appropriate to the ultimate objectives of widespread economic recovery and conflict reduction. Do training programmes and reconstructed markets really suffice to rebuild economies effectively? Are there more urgent needs in the economy than skills and places for commerce? Do peace-promoting radios and modest economic incentives for rebels to leave their armed groups really make much of a dent in the level of conflict?

Conflict reduction

Conflict remains frequent and unpredictable in North and South Kivu. Only in Ituri district is open conflict showing a downward trend. The numbers of internally displaced persons and returnees reflect the level of conflict and the extent to which pacification is taking place at the community level. These are provided in Table 3.

UNDP pacification programmes must address two different types of armed conflict. There are, on the one hand, intra-community and inter-ethnic conflicts arising from disputes over land and property, and this, for the most part, has been at the core of conflicts in the Ituri District. On the other hand, there are aggressive operations by armed groups which finance their activities through trafficking in natural resources and plundering the property of citizens.

UNDP has addressed the first type of conflict with varying success. The UNDP strategy strengthens social cohesion by supporting conciliatory programming on community radios and by supporting the formation and functioning of local peace-building committees at the community, groupement or territory levels for resolving disputes. In Ituri District, local committees have been established at the community (baraza), groupement (Local Peace and Development Committee, Comité local de paix et développement (CLPD)), and territory (Local Development Committee, Comité local de développement (CLD)) levels, supplemented by women's Noyaux pacifistes des mamans (NPM) initiatives, which intervene in peace-building and development. In addition, there are the Land Committee (Commission Foncière) units which work to resolve land disputes and which have been uniquely successful in achieving results. In South Kivu, there are the Village Development Committee (VDC) (Comité villageois de développement (CVD)) at the community level; and in North Kivu, there are barazas and a few Permanent Local Conciliation Committees (Comités locaux permanents de conciliation (CLPC)) at the groupement or the chefferie level.

This strategy has proven effective in promoting social cohesion in Ituri District. It has proven less effective in addressing aggressions by armed groups, which are characteristic of the conflict in the Kivus.

UNDP programmes in the Kivus have therefore relied on programmes to support combatant demobilization by providing resources for ex-combatants to re-enter normal civilian life with vocational training (Community Reintegration and Rehabilitation Programme (CRRP)). It has resulted in a modest number of ex-combatants leaving armed groups and returning to community life after receiving vocational training and kits to practice their skills (see Table 4).

It is difficult to demonstrate any real success. Conflict continues unabated in these provinces. There has been no monitoring of the programme and one knows very little about what has happened to the participants apart from testimonies by implementing partners, who uniformly raise doubts that the ex-combatant programmes have succeeded in reinserting ex-combatants, either economically or psychologically.¹¹

Different types of combat require different strategies. Three years ago, UNDP commissioned a study of the diverse causes of conflict in North Kivu and the study cautioned, as others have, against attributing the conflict to competition for exploitation of mineral resources.¹² Conflict over land is said to be primary. Nevertheless, the exploitation of minerals supports the import of arms and the campaigns of armed groups. It gives the conflict a distinctly economic dimension. The implication is that significant economic incentives must figure in any effort to reduce the aggression by armed groups. Providing kits and entrepreneurial alternatives to ex-combatants may not provide sufficient economic incentives to successfully encourage ex-combatants to leave armed groups permanently.

Though the efforts at social cohesion through peace-building committees have included deliberate efforts to ensure the participation of women, it is not clear whether women's participation is sufficient to ensure that gender equality be reflected in their principles, procedures, and enumeration of priorities. A more in-depth inquiry should be undertaken to determine how effectively the peace-building committees incorporate and address the needs of women and men equally.

Economic Recovery

UNDP has also aimed to revitalize the economy, sometimes with programmes that creatively use small enterprises, and the reconstruction of market facilities, to promote the re-insertion of ex-combatants or to facilitate the peaceable interaction of previously antagonistic ethnic groups. The strategy in Ituri consists of building centres where individuals are trained in vocations such as carpentry and baking, supporting the creation of micro-enterprises and constructing market pavilions which were destroyed in the fighting. Markets with new structures have become active again. Five health centres and maternity wards have been constructed and five primary schools have been rehabilitated. But there is no indication that the UNDP strategy in Ituri has contributed to an economic recovery. Both men and women trained in vocational centres in carpentry or hair dressing or accounting have little or no work and do not produce enough income to allow their businesses to grow. The limiting factor is capital. Without capital or credit, economic recovery is likely to be slow or not at all and, for a variety of reasons, microfinance was never supported in Ituri.

An apparent gender stereotyping in the curriculum and courses offered in the vocational training centres has limited women's access to resources that would help generate greater income.

Economic recovery in South Kivu appears only slightly more promising. As part of the Join project (Projet conjoint) financed by The Netherlands, oil presses and flour mills are supported, cattle and goats have been distributed and market warehouses and pavilions have been constructed. As part of the retraining programmes for ex-combatants (CRRP), a number of women and men have received training and tools for revenue generation. Individual testimonies from beneficiaries are positive and a limited number of household economies (estimated at 7,000) are more secure as a result of these programmes. But there are at least two limiting factors: one is the lack of access to capital and the other is the continuing presence of conflict.

A targeted initiative to address the socio-economic reintegration needs of survivors of sexual violence, the Project for Security, Empowerment and Reintegration of Women in North and South Kivu (PSAR), has achieved very limited success in bringing women out of poverty, or in supporting community-led initiatives to protect girls and women from violence. Limiting factors include unclear targeting of beneficiaries, a gap in addressing the underlying causes of economic and social vulnerability, and the lack of support for community protection structures and dialogue that engage both men and women.

Providing vocational training and income earning opportunities for households makes limited contributions to general economic recovery without generalized access to capital. Capital is a necessary complementary input for entrepreneurial training. The intention was to support micro-credit in collaboration with the UNDP Microfinance Support Programme PASMIF (Programme d'appui au secteur de la microfinance), but the slow response of PASMIF and its apparent unwillingness to adopt its lending programme to poorer and more vulnerable households made combining microcredit with entrepreneurial training impossible.¹³ Special efforts were made in Walungu, one of the four principal sites of the South Kivu programme, to no avail. Another effort was made in Luvungi where, in spite of efforts, the number of participants remains too small to be significant. As well, continuing conflict plays a role in limiting these efforts at economic recovery.

In North Kivu, in spite of pockets of conflict, economic recovery appears to be more promising. The strategy that has been implemented there is largely the same as in South Kivu: market rehabilitation, vocational training and support for revenue generation activities among ex-combatants (CRRP) and socio-economic reintegration and community-lead initiatives to protect survivors of sexual violence (PSAR). The difference is that microcredit is widely available through microfinance institutions trained through a UNDP national programme. In specific localities such as Beni, UNDP provides support to a large scale microcredit programme specifically serving poor households, providing a new service called 'Credit-Savings with Education' managed by the microfinance institution Mekre Beni. This includes ensuring that women have access to credit, which is a relatively unique experience in a context where a highly discriminatory family code limits women's ownership of assets required to secure credit. This code makes it more difficult for women to access credit. Although valuable for the population and capable of making a difference, the Mekre Beni programme remains nevertheless limited by the amount of funds available, given the demand.

A concern is that the microfinance programme is not linked specifically to revenue generation programmes at vocational institutions, markets, the PSAR programme's Multi-Purpose Community Centres (MPCC) and ex-combatant programmes (CRRP). And apart from the unique and potentially quite successful programme in Beni, it is limited to urban areas. But in North Kivu, unlike Ituri District and South Kivu, it has proven its value, not only for those with resources but also for more vulnerable populations in a way that serves men and women equally with the strong majority being women.

UNDP has furthermore taken a firmer interest in filling a gap in UNDP programming by collaborating with the private sector, notably by hosting the first North Kivu Economic Forum in 2010, and ensuring resolutions are tracked and implemented through a Follow up Committee on the Implementation of the Resolutions (Comité de suivi de la mise en œuvre des résolutions).

Key Factors Affecting Progress Toward the Outcome

UNDP's strategy for conflict reduction in Ituri District was appropriate; its focus on social cohesion aptly addressed the ethnic rivalries and intra-community tension which were at the core of the conflict. The same strategy for conflict reduction was less apt for the Kivus where the conflict is different. There may be conflict over land and property in the Kivus, as in Ituri, but it is intensified by access to minerals. Armed groups operating in the Kivus have an economic motive to control access to valuable assets, one that is not diminished by either the social cohesion strategies or satisfied by the revenue generating alternatives offered to ex-combatants.

UNDP's strategy for economic revitalization in Ituri and South Kivu has only partially realized its objectives. The strategy either lacked crucial elements or, because of insufficient funding and lack of coordination within UNDP, elements were not included. The strategy in Ituri offered facilities for augmenting human capital by providing vocational training, support to some microenterprises and the rehabilitation of markets along with some social services. But beneficiaries of vocational training have little or no employment and where they have employment, the return is modest. Microenterprises, owned by both men and women, are unable to expand for a couple of reasons. Firstly, training for women is in traditional female occupations and generally with little regard to profitability. And secondly, financial capital is difficult to access, in spite of the fact that demand in Bunia and surrounding areas for financial capital is growing. Given UNDP's support to microfinance nationally, including the draft microfinance law, it is curious that its modest economic recovery programmes in eastern DRC do not incorporate the services of microcredit institutions.

greater results in economic recovery, it is essential to ensure that capital be more widely available.

A comparable situation is found in South Kivu where productive inputs have been provided to a significant number of vulnerable households increasing their food security. The extent of the contribution and the numbers of households are too limited for the programme to have a significant impact on the economy. Access to small amounts of financial capital through a reliable microcredit institution with programmes tailored to vulnerable households is essential for expanding the impact of UNDP's limited inputs.

Conclusion

Considerable progress has been realized in diminishing conflict where it is attributable to ethnic rivalries and intra-community conflict over land and property. Far less progress has been realized where the conflict is due to the aggression of organized armed groups, where there is a need for a radically different strategy. UNDP efforts at economic recovery have been limited by the modest scale of inputs in these three different localities diminished by radically reduced budgets for the 2008-2012 programming cycle. They are also limited by an apparent reluctance within UNDP to adapt existing microcredit practices, to which UNDP has been a significant contributor, for complementing the building of human capital with the provision of much needed financial capital. To achieve

Addressing gender equality and women's empowerment across UNDP's eight outcomes.

Key Findings

To what extent has progress been made at the outcome level to contribute to gender equality and women's empowerment as an end, and also as a means to full outcome realization?

There is generally partial progress or none at all towards the realization of gender equality and women's empowerment at the outcome level. There are pockets of success at the project or micro-project level within outcomes P1 (support for MDG achievement), P2 (community revitalisation), P3 (HIV/AIDS), G6 (local governance and decentralisation), and G8 (security and judicial governance). There are also several missed opportunities to address gender equality in the governance and poverty reduction programmes. The primary reasons for these missed opportunities will be addressed in the text that follows. On the whole, the progress has been partial.

Are the contributions of UNDP towards gender equality and women's empowerment relevant to the UNDP Country Programme Document and policies and priorities of the national authorities?

The UNDP Country Programme Document provides little specific guidance on UNDP

DRC Country Programme priorities with respect to gender equality and women's empowerment. It is therefore difficult to say whether UNDP's contributions are relevant. Progress towards the realization of the National Gender Strategy and National Gender Plan of Action is partial. UNDP has made efforts to support the equal access of women and men to decision-making posts. The contributions of UNDP to other national priorities, including the electoral law and GPRSP 2 are pertinent, but not entirely effective with respect to gender equality. The support of UNDP for the increased access of women to microfinance in the draft microfinance law is valuable but has not been in place at the field level. UNDP's support has made pertinent contributions to agreement on the importance of the revision of the Family Code among legal practitioners and members of the Legal Reform Commission. On the whole, the progress has been partial.

Are the gender equality and women's empowerment achievements sustainable and/or owned by the government and civil society?

The lack of sustainability and appropriation of achievements to-date by key ministries and civil society has limited the ability of potentially successful initiatives ever reaching critical mass. Three key factors influencing the sustainability and appropriation are: 1. lack of consistent technical and logistical support from UNDP programme pillars for gender equality in key priority areas; 2. lack of significant policymaker commitment to gender-responsive policy, planning, and budgeting; and 3. weak civil society consensus on key priorities. On the whole, the progress has been partial.

Overview

The outcome evaluation focuses on analysing the impact of UNDP's programmes with an eye towards the institutionalisation of relevant, effective, efficient, transformative, and durable changes in gender equality and women's empowerment in strategic focus areas. The strategic focus areas are those where there is a need and demand at the national level, the existence of a UNDP mandate and technical and administrative skills within UNDP DRC and UNDP as an institution to support the mandate, and a UNDP comparative advantage in those areas in relation to other institutions operating in DRC.

The evaluation data reveal that either partial or no progress at all on gender equality and women's empowerment has been achieved within UNDP Poverty Reduction and Governance outcomes. No outcomes have attained full progress on gender equality and women's empowerment. There has been partial progress or pockets of success at the project or micro-project level with outcomes P1 (achievement of MDGs), P2 (community rehabilitation), P3 (HIV/AIDS), G6 (local governance and decentralisation), and G8 (security and judicial governance). The following section provides an overview of key programmatic successes and also of missed opportunities, which is then followed by an analysis of endogenous and exogenous factors that have contributed both to the successes and missed opportunities.

Progress at the Outcome Level

The support of the UNDP (Gender Unit) to the Ministries of Planning and Gender has been essential for the elaboration of gender-responsive Priority Action Plans and Medium-Term Expenditure Frameworks (PAP/MTEF) within five key sectors: agriculture, health, rural development, gender, and primary and secondary education (Outcome P1).³⁴ Otherwise, national priorities with respect to gender equality and women's empowerment have remained largely unaddressed, including those within the overall revisions of the GPRSP 1, the strategy and budget sections of the GPRSP 2, and the 2011 national-level PAP/MTEFs.

Within the context of economic revitalisation and social cohesion initiatives, UNDP has supported the creation of the Pacifist Nucleus of Women of Ituri and the provision of credit to men and women in the same District. (Outcome P2). This support has been useful to ensure that women play a key role in social cohesion measures and that both men and women have access to the training and credit necessary to emerge from poverty. Unfortunately, this approach has not been replicated in North or South Kivu.

As well under Outcome P2, there has been some limited progress meeting the socio-economic reintegration needs of survivors of sexual violence in North and South Kivu within the PSAR Project. A more detailed review of the PSAR project is presented in the next section focusing on Sexual and Gender-Based Violence (SGBV). Beyond the initiatives in Ituri, the remaining social cohesion initiatives in North and South Kivu under this outcome are largely male-dominated, even though women have played an active role in conflict mitigation. Economic revitalisation initiatives have not been paired with the credit in North and South Kivu, thus precluding the emergence of both men and women from poverty.

34 Bope, G. (2011). Note Technique à l'attention de Son Excellence Monsieur le Ministre du Plan – Concerne: renforcement du processus de déclinaison du genre dans le budget de l'État 2012, April 2011. [G. Bope is an Advisor in Charge of Regional Integration, Planning and Decentralization]

Initiatives to respond to HIV/AIDS (Outcome P3), and specifically the UNDP-financed document on Gender and HIV/AIDS in the Democratic Republic of Congo, have encouraged recognition of the gendered dimensions of HIV/AIDS prevalence. The gendered dimensions of HIV/AIDS, however, have not been incorporated into national policy and planning documents and programmes.

Under Outcome G6 (local governance and decentralisation), women have engaged for the first time in local and provincial development planning efforts. In spite of the support that UNDP has provided for the development of gender-responsive training and planning tools, the specific priorities of men/boys and women/girls do not appear within local and provincial development plans in Equateur and North Kivu provinces.

Under Outcome G5 (political governance), UNDP has supported the Congolese Government in the preparation of the first National Gender Policy and National Gender Plan. UNDP has also put in place, through its PACE Project, plans to encourage women to vote in all upcoming elections and to become candidates in local elections. However, concrete changes in citizen participation have not, and are likely not to take place due to: 1. the lack of an integrated long-term political governance programme; 2. the late start of existing election initiatives (implemented by the MONUSCO Gender and Elections Section); and 3. the absence of technical support and advocacy from the UNDP Political and Administrative Governance Units to support phased implementation of quotas for women in public office in the newly passed Electoral Law and to support other measures to address discrimination in the civil service sector reform.

Progress towards the Prevention and Response to Sexual and Gender-Based Violence – Cross-Cutting Theme

Sexual and Gender-Based Violence (SGBV) at the Outcome Level

UNDP's Access to Justice Project has supported increased state capacity to protect civilians and has also created positive externalities for the functioning of the whole penal system in North and South Kivu and Ituri (Outcome G8). On the other-hand, UNDP's PSAR Project (Outcome P2) has not yet made significant contributions to peace building and economic recovery of survivors of sexual violence at the community and regional levels. This is largely due to the lack of strong project management staff to implement the project as it was designed in the Prodoc; the lack of a clear targeting of beneficiaries; the lack of synergy between the PSAR project and other projects in the poverty reduction programme, and the lack of engagement of communities in the development of strategies to protect women and girls from violence. As well, the Project has missed the opportunity to link beneficiary communities to the services provided in other UNDP projects and by other partners, in particular those for men as perpetrators, victims, relatives of women that have been violated, and potential advocates in combating sexual violence.³⁵

SGBV at the Political/Inter-Agency Level

The evaluation data indicate that UNDP should not undertake any new projects to address sexual and gender-based violence. Rather, UNDP staff at the national level should seize missed opportunities within existing programmes and use existing resources to address SGBV priorities identified by UNDP project staff, with the Ministry of Justice and the Mixed Justice Committee. One of the factors impeding UNDP from taking on this role is the intense competition between key international stakeholders who work on sexual violence. In spite of improvements in coordination linked to the arrival of Leila Zerrougui, Deputy Special Representative of the Secretary General, there are still challenges related to the lack of cooperation and fierce competition among UN agencies working on sexual violence. If this continues unaddressed, it will be difficult for UNDP to play a stronger leadership role within the national policy arena, in particular on Access Justice for survivors of sexual violence and on the development of an independent team of experts to implement provisions in United Nations Security Council Resolution 1888.

35 Clingendael Conflict Research Unit (2011). Policy Brief: Increasing Security in DR Congo: Gender-Responsive Strategies for Combating Sexual Violence, June 2011.

Key Factors

The generally limited progress on gender equality and women's empowerment within and across the eight outcomes can be attributed to several key factors:

The UNDP Gender Strategy

The UNDP Country Office normative strategy for gender equality and women's empowerment is comprised of two components: The 2010 Gender Strategy and the 2010 Memorandum on Taking Gender into Account in the UNDP DRC Programme. The strategy, as well as the Memorandum, are largely theoretical documents that do not reflect a consensus on gender equality among key stakeholders, including programme officers, government leaders, key civil society actors, women's organisations, and beneficiaries (men/boys, and women/girls). This has limited the realization of initiatives across key areas where it would be essential for UNDP to work synergistically to realise measurable results. For example, opportunities have been missed to have a significant, measurable impact on gender-responsive planning and budgeting under Outcomes P1, P2, G5, G6, and G7, which feasibly could have been avoided with a strategy or plan focused on key areas of synergy and collaboration.

Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment at the Project Development Stage

In general, UNDP projects are designed and submitted to donors without proper vetting and technical support from UNDP technical and senior management staff. The general lack of proper vetting and technical support takes its toll on the integration of gender equality and women's empowerment at the project development stage in the majority of outcomes. The result is inconsistent and incomplete definition of gender equality priorities at the project and output level, and also ultimately at the outcome level.

Outcome indicators, and Output and Output Indicators to Track Gender Equality

There is a marked absence of outcome and output indicators to define key gender equality and women's empowerment objectives in the UNDP Country Programme Action Plan. In the absence of these key tools, it is difficult to monitor and evaluate progress at all levels of the Country Office portfolio and to hold heads of programme and other key stakeholders accountable for progress in their respective outcomes. Furthermore, it also makes it challenging to determine where and when additional technical support is needed.

UNDP Technical Support on Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment

Technical support for the process of defining and implementing gender equality and women's empowerment priorities in UNDP programmes and projects is inadequate given the vast and complex UNDP portfolio in DRC. Theoretically, technical support should be provided by the Gender Unit, and complemented by support technical staff within the programmes. In practice, however, the Gender Unit's time is spent scattered across too many competing initiatives, namely project implementation, intensive technical support to Ministries, and gender equality monitoring and evaluation of UNDP projects. As well, the Unit staff members as a whole simply do not possess the requisite seniority and technical qualifications to address the support needs of the large and complex UNDP DRC Country Programme. Though the Governance Pillar also has a gender expert, her support is not sufficient given the immense needs within the pillar for technical guidance at all stages of project implementation. In general, gender expertise is lacking in the programme pillars.

Implementation of the Gender Marker

The gender marker system for tracking UNDP funding allocations to gender equality and women's empowerment has been in place since 2010. In practice, UNDP Project Managers have rated their own projects after they were already being implemented, and only once as a prerequisite for obtaining the next cycle of funding (in March 2010). As such, all evidence suggests that UNDP Senior Management does not use the gender marker data as a strategic management tool, as it was intended, to improve the gender-responsiveness of UNDP programming at the project development phase.

UNDP Senior Leadership Capacity and Commitment to Implement Targeted Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment Programming

Evaluation data points to a lack of senior leadership capacity and commitment to implement targeted gender equality and women's empowerment programming. It also points to a pattern of relegating anything to do with gender to the UNDP Gender Unit, even though the ultimate responsibility for gender equality rests with the heads of programme.

Performance Summary, Conclusions and Recommendations

The table below summarizes the eight outcomes which define the UNDP programme 2008-2012.

Based on a review of the data obtained from documents, interviews and field observations, the evaluation team has assessed each outcome's progress in realizing 5 key objectives by indicating whether it is best characterized by one of the following:

1. Fully
2. Mostly
3. Partially
4. Not at all

Tables 5 and 6 below summarize this for the poverty pillar and the governance pillar separately.

Table 5. The Eight Outcomes

Outcome	Section	Definition
P1	Poverty	National capacities for the framing of policies promoting attainment of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are strengthened.
P2	Poverty	The communities are pacified and local economies are revived.
P3	Poverty	Response to HIV/AIDS is harmonized and national programme management capacities are strengthened.
P4	Poverty	Capacities of national institutions are strengthened to manage the environment and expand energy services, especially to the poor.
G5	Governance	Citizen participation in the exercise of power is increased and access to public services is improved.
G6	Governance	The national, provincial and local levels of government have improved their capacities to provide public services.
G7	Governance	The public administration is more efficient and reliable and offers services to citizens effectively, equitably and with transparency.
G8	Governance	Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State.

Ranking the performance for each of eight components against these essential criteria can be more succinctly done with a numerical ranking. Table 5 assumes the following: fully = 4, mostly = 3, partially = 2 and not at all = 1. In the bottom rows, the eight rankings are totaled and expressed as a percentage of what would be a perfect score (20). This gives a shorthand performance indicator for each outcome.

¹ Performance ranking: Fully = 4; Mostly = 3; Partially = 2; and Not at all = 1

Most of the assessments indicate that overall progress in realizing the objectives, specifically in achieving results, has been partial. Progress has been mostly realized in preparing the PRSP and in implementation of the Global Fund programme to respond to the HIV/AIDS epidemic. Progress in other outcomes has been judged to be partial.

Progress in designing and executing programmes to achieve gender equality have been partial in all outcomes. The overall conclusion is that there is a general lack of measurable and durable changes with respect to gender inequality.

UNDP has taken care to ensure that the outcomes, as they are defined, are in line with the UNDP's CPD and the GPRSP and, as a consequence, meeting the standards relevance in all outcomes has been fully realized.

Building in sustainability has been mostly achieved in three out of the eight outcomes all of which are within the poverty pillar. Realizing effective government ownership overall, particularly among the governance outcomes, has been partial.

The efficiency of outcome implementation is judged partial in five out of the eight outcomes and either mostly or fully in three others. The efficiency of delivery depends clearly on the circumstances of implementation.

In only two outcomes, does UNDP performance score 70 per cent or higher taking all essential criteria into consideration. This report has reviewed the reasons for this level of performance. They include, among others, UNDP's laborious procedures, mid-cycle budget reductions, the persistence of conflict and lack of a clear and strategic overall programme focus. The conclusion is that overall UNDP performance in realizing these outcomes is partial and is in need of improvement.

Key Findings and Recommendations

The following key findings in Table 9 summarize the most significant of the outcome evaluation observations and, in doing so, make recommendations where improvements to the present programme are likely to result in a more positive performance.

Table 9. Summary of Key Findings and Recommendations³⁶

Key Findings	Recommendations
1. Programme Coherence <ul style="list-style-type: none"> The elements of the country programme in each of the two pillars do not add up to a clear and coherent strategy and in some cases, the components fit awkwardly into the pillar to which they belong. Outcome activities under the governance rubric operate in parallel with outcome activities under the poverty pillar without taking advantage of the inherent synergy between them. The poverty pillar includes an eclectic collection of economic recovery programmes which lack the necessary coherence to make a significant contribution to ending conflict in the DRC. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Revise the structure of the country programme to ensure that the components are sensibly prioritized, that all the anticipated outcomes are of clear strategic value, and that components sharing a strategic domain reinforce each other so that progress toward outcomes can benefit from a more coherent programme. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Ensure the descriptions of outcomes are less grandiose, more feasible and more likely to serve as concrete objectives against which staff, donors and evaluators are able to measure their attainment.

Key Findings	Recommendations
2. Results-based Programme Management <ul style="list-style-type: none"> UNDP's efforts to promote 'Managing for Development Results' (MfDR) and the programme approach has not given rise to an effective monitoring and evaluation strategy. The indicators, critical data and annual targets for each of the outcomes in the ERBM platform, as well as the results framework in the original CPAP 2008-2012 document, are not adequately utilized by UNDP DRC or by national partners for monitoring, evaluation and reporting on outcomes. There is not a sufficient understanding of the outcomes among UNDP staff or UNDP partners, and this has resulted in a significant delay in the implementation of the original evaluation plan 2008-2012. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Revise the outcome indicators to ensure indicators assess and report on outcomes and monitor each outcome systematically, at least once a year, based on a harmonized monitoring mechanism across all the programme units. Ensure that at least one indicator per output is gender specific. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Develop a monitoring and evaluation mechanism that is sensitive to gender for the new results framework of the country programme, based on an approach that is capable of being simply applied by all programme staff and partners in order to promote the realization of outcomes up to the end of the cycle. Ensure the integration of gender in the definition of outcomes and outputs as well as in the indicators of outcomes and outputs in the new results framework.

³⁶ The report does not specify who should assume responsibility for the recommendations and instead leaves this to the discretion of UNDP.

Key Findings	Recommendations
3. Capacity Development <ul style="list-style-type: none"> The majority of activities incorporate a capacity building component which is often a combination of material support such as office equipment, including computers and other IT material, training and workshops to discuss approaches, methods, transfer knowledge and share experiences. In many cases, material support is in place but training and other mechanisms for transferring knowledge show limited results. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Plan for and include a post capacity building evaluation tool which assesses, for example, how the participant has benefitted from the training offered, how the training has been used in view of the person's tasks and whether the training improved the performance of the participant or team. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Develop a detailed diagnostic tool that assesses capacity building needs across the programme, which includes timely evaluations of the results and impact of capacity building efforts and includes additional support, such as coaching and on the job training.

Key Findings	Recommendations
4. National capacities for the framing of policies promoting attainment of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are strengthened. (Outcome P1) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> The weakest link in this initiative are the provincial government partners whose Priority Action Plans (PAPs), Medium-Term Expenditure Frameworks (MTEFs) and other budgeting exercises guide implementation of the national strategy. The initiative requires greater planning and monitoring skills than are presently available. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Strengthen the capacity of provincial bodies implementing the GPRSP 2 locally to implement and monitor the programmes proposed. Oversee an effort to partner private sector firms with provincial planning bodies under the scrutiny of UNDP to sharpen the accounting and planning skills of provincial functionaries. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Initiate a nationwide poverty analysis, with a strong gender equality component, in collaboration with national and local staff in the Ministry of Planning to substantiate and correct the assumptions made in the GPRSP 2.

Key Findings	Recommendations
5. The communities are pacified and local economies are revived. (Outcome P2) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> The strategies devised to dismantle non-state armed groups, especially in the North Kivu, South Kivu and Maniema Provinces, have done little to realize their desired outcomes. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Support efforts at regulating the trade in natural resource: expand the pilot trade centres (centres de négoce) project as a tactic for excluding the participation of non-state armed groups; this is not meant to replace the reinsertion programme for ex-combatants, but rather to complement it. Build upon pockets of success within economic recovery and social initiatives in the district of Ituri and adapt them to the context of North and South Kivu; improve the targeting and support the full implementation of the PSAR project, while also ensuring that the project functions in synergy with the UNDP's Access to Justice Project.
	Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Build a collaborative partnership with private operators in order to impose limits on the commercial activities of armed groups by regulating their commerce in natural resources.

Key Findings	Recommendations
6. The communities are pacified and local economies are revived. (Outcome P2) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> One of the key elements limiting progress in poverty reduction in Ituri and South Kivu has been the lack of access to capital, or microcredit. Microcredit is available in the marketplace but poor and vulnerable households do not qualify to benefit from it due to a lack of collateral. The positive experience of providing microcredit in Beni has demonstrated the feasibility of UNDP successfully offering microcredit to poor and vulnerable households. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Urge the current UNDP Microfinance Support Programme PASMIF (Programme d'appui au secteur de la microfinance) to devise ways of providing microcredit access to vulnerable and poor households and to support business development.
	Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Introduce microcredit as an integral part of the Community-based recovery programme (Programme de relèvement communautaire), notably in the eastern provinces to support economic growth by making capital available to households at all income levels.

Key Findings	Recommendations
7. Capacities of national institutions are strengthened to manage the environment and expand energy services, especially to the poor. (Outcome P4) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • UNDP's concern to focus principally on preparing a strategic national plan to be eligible for international funding diverts attention from making sure that practical applications are pursued in order to ground the projects in concrete realities. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Following discussions with the Ministry of Environment, settle on an approach to national execution that will resolve the present cessation of work on the PANA project. • Take measures to perform a gender analysis and to target men and women in the strategy and capacity-building efforts associated with the PANA project. As well, use the existing REDD (Reducing Emissions from Deforestation and Forest Degradation in Developing Countries) Gender Thematic group to integrate gender in the REDD National Strategy.
	Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Embark on a selection of field level initiatives to support the environment programme's theoretical initiatives with practical demonstrations; those initiatives do not need to be extensive, but there must be some indication that the programme is prepared to implement its claims with concrete initiatives. • Consider the possibility of establishing the environment programme as a separate pillar.

Key Findings	Recommendations
8. Citizen participation in the exercise of power is increased and access to public services is improved. (Outcome G5) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Support to the electoral cycle, including the management of the basket fund to back up the Electoral Cycle Support Project (PACE), has promoted citizen participation in the electoral cycle. Financing the project via a basket fund has allowed UNDP to manage its contribution to the electoral process through an integrated approach, coordinating donor contributions and drawing on, as needed, international advice. Management of the basket fund has been laborious and slow, which has occasionally undermined the convenience and the appropriateness of using the fund for financing the electoral cycle. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Identify obstacles inhibiting the improvement of UNDP's procurement procedures in order to respond to the needs of those managing the electoral cycle in a more timely fashion; provide better support to NGOs to play an effective role in the electoral cycle. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Continue building capacity in the Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC), to ensure the organizations effectiveness in managing the process. Integrate the support to political parties into the support to the Parliament and the Provincial Assemblies and ensure that all parties elected can benefit from UNDP's support. Within the PACE project, develop a long-term sub-project focused on the political participation of women and young girls, including the provision of strategic support for the capacity-building of civil society organizations and for a culture of female leadership at the national level and targeted provincial and local levels.

Key Findings	Recommendations
9. The national, provincial and local levels of government have improved their capacities to provide public services. (Outcome G6) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> The advantages of decentralization are clear and UNDP has played an important facilitation role for the Technical Unit for Support of the Decentralization Process (CTAD). Development plans have been elaborated in a participatory manner and these have been an important tool for provincial authorities to provide public services. There are no resources, however, to put them into effect and consequently no impact on beneficiaries. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Organize a Forum II to follow up on Forum I of 2007 and play a facilitation role in identifying those obstacles which are impeding progress on decentralization. Build upon and scale-up instances of success in the programme to ensure that the priorities of men and women are enumerated consistently and scaled up to the local and provincial level. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Identify synergies between the administrative and economic governance components and integrate these with the decentralization component if opportune and ensure that essential reforms with regard to public financial management and public administration are congruent with the decentralization process.

Key Findings	Recommendations
10. The public administration is more efficient and reliable and offers services to citizens effectively, equitably and with transparency. (Outcome G7) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • The administrative and economic governance programme is here treated separately from decentralization, and yet, their functions are closely linked. • The economic governance programme, as it presently stands, lacks coherence and in spite of different outputs, because of insufficient resources, has had little impact. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Continue support to the Cour des Comptes and analyze the factors that contribute to achieving the outcome; consider using this approach in other governance components. • Operationalize the Aid and Investment Management Platform, PGAI (Plateforme de gestion de l'aide et des investissements), and encourage the government to provide a single aid coordination mechanism. • Accelerate support to ensure that the legal framework with regard to public administration and public finance reforms are concluded. • Increase UNDP's support to government to encourage improvements in the quality and availability of sex-disaggregated data used by policy makers and planners. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Take advantage of synergies between the administrative and economic governance programme and the decentralization programme in order to advance fundamental reforms in the proposed reforms in public finance and public administration.
11. Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State (Outcome G8) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • UNDP's Access to Justice Project and other similar projects operating in Eastern Congo have measurably increased access to justice for survivors of sexual violence. It has improved the whole penal chain for survivors of sexual violence and also created positive externalities for the whole security and justice system. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Continue the access to justice programme and expand the approach to address the access to justice needs of women and girls and the economic needs after trial, and expand measures to re-integrate them into communities. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Partner with UN Women's initiatives on reparations by taking on an increased role in Women's Access to Justice at the national policy level.

Key Findings	Recommendations
12. Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State (Outcome G8) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> UNDP has been assisting the government with reforms in the justice sector, including: reconstruction of training centres for the police, training police officers, training new judges and access to free justice programmes. In addition, UNDP has introduced an access to justice programme to support victims of sexual violence. Reforms to justice are on-going and some results are substantial, notably in the area of improved police training. The access to justice programme is showing initial results. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Make an inventory of activities undertaken by other donors in justice reform sector in order to ensure complementarity. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Continue with police training and if possible expand the programme taking into consideration the proximity police approach. Expand access to justice programme in numbers of participants and in extent of area served.
13. Armed violence is significantly reduced and the protection of the citizens is effectively secured by the services of the State (Outcome G8) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Post-brassage and disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) activities have been successful but have not resolved the conflict. In order to make these efforts more sustainable and have a greater impact on conflict prevention, there is a need for the development of medium term poverty alleviation programmes in which the ongoing activities under the current reduction of Small Arms and Light Weapons (SALW) initiative could be integrated. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Include the reduction of SALW initiatives within forthcoming poverty alleviation programmes to support DDR activities. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Transfer all security programmes from the governance pillar to the poverty and conflict reduction programmes.

Key Findings	Recommendations
14. Key Finding, Gender <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Progress toward gender equality and women's empowerment is either partial or non-existent. There is largely limited progress, or "pockets of success" at the project or micro-project level within outcomes P1 (support for MDG achievement), P2 and P3 (community revitalisation and HIV/AIDS), G6 (local governance and decentralisation), and G8 (security and judicial governance). The weak overall progress is attributable to several determining factors: i) weak operationalization of the UNDP Gender Strategy and the inability to incorporate gender analysis and strategies in the project development phase; ii) weak identification of outcome indicators, outputs, and output indicators focused on gender equality and women's empowerment; iii) insufficient technical expertise to embed gender equality and women's empowerment in key UNDP programmes and projects. 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Ensure a consensus on key gender equality priorities, update and operationalize the UNDP Gender Strategy, in consultation with UNDP senior leadership, and in partnership with UN-Women and the United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUSCO); as well, prepare a technical plan to assist UNDP programmatic and cross-cutting units to implement the strategy. Build upon and scale-up instances of success in key areas such as gender-responsive budgeting and planning (including the possible secondment of personnel to the Ministry of Planning) (P1), economic revitalisation and social cohesion (P2), HIV/AIDS (P3), decentralisation (G5), and security and judicial governance (P8). Develop synergies and common approaches for addressing sexual violence in outcomes P1 (support for the MDGs), P2 (community rehabilitation), P3 (HIV/AIDS), G6 (local governance and decentralisation), G7 (administrative governance) and G8 (post-brassage). Ensure that the resources from the PACE Project basket fund are available to the MONUSCO Gender and Elections Team to ensure immediate implementation of planned activities. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Operationalize a long-term UNDP gender strategy in synergy with and to support the development of the new UNDP 2012-2014 Country Office Strategy. The strategy should be developed in close collaboration with UN Women, with a focus on key strategic domains of intervention for UNDP: gender-responsive budgeting and planning, local governance and decentralisation, economic revitalisation and social cohesion, and access to justice. Improve considerably the quality and quantity of gender equality expertise in the Country Office as a whole, and limit the functions of the Gender Unit to quality assurance with respect to gender equality in CO programming.

Key Findings	Recommendations
15. Key Finding, Gender <ul style="list-style-type: none"> In addition to the two existing projects focused on providing services to survivors of sexual and gender-based violence, UNDP should also take a larger leadership role to address sexual violence priorities identified in existing UNDP programmes, with the Ministry of Justice and the Mixed Justice Committee (Thematic Group). 	Recommendations for the current programme <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Assume an active role in national-level politics with respect to access to justice for survivors of sexual violence. In particular, increase the capacity of the Ministry of Justice to coordinate initiatives on sexual violence, within the context of existing UNDP support to the Ministry. Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> In collaboration with MONUSCO and UN-Women, develop and disseminate a standardized methodology for integrating sexual violence prevention and response in all UNDP programmes.
16. Key Finding, Gender <ul style="list-style-type: none"> There is a significant lack of gender balance and respect for women staff members at all levels of the UNDP Country Office in the DRC. Progress in this area is greatly needed so that UNDP can model the changes it aims to inspire with respect to gender equality in its programming. 	Recommendations for the next programme cycle <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Take immediate measures at the institutional level to address the lack of gender balance and respect for women staff members in the Country Office.

Achievement and Challenges with regard to the Development Plans

Table 10. Achievements and Challenges

Achievements	Challenges
Increase ownership, involvement and visibility of the government's authority.	Fiscal transfers from GoDRC are irregular and insufficient; this will undermine routine tasks. Some territories remain instable and insecurity prevents local authorities from working in all sectors.
Link between priorities and provincial PRSP and MDGs.	Pro-poor spending to provide essential services to the poor and a stronger link with community rehabilitation.
Key data available: population, poverty index (for the province only), MDG and gender.	Tracking data over time is important to ensure that the right beneficiaries are targeted.
Some plans have logical frameworks.	M&E is generally weak.
Provincial authorities develop capacities to administer the province, including such functions as tax collecting.	Fiscal transfers to ETDs are minimal and not in time.
The administrative and political authorities learn to work together and local development plans are discussed in the assemblies and annual plans signed by the Governor.	Creating expectations that these plans will indeed be financed whereas the retrocession (grant) is limited and mostly used for paying salaries.
Basic infrastructure provided to enable local authorities to manage their functions.	Risks that recurrent budgets are insufficient for maintenance.
NGOs are participating in routine discussions of provincial and local plans and evaluations of the action plans and can wield influence. They are members of the oversight committee for PADDL.	NGOs remain at times in a conflict position with government but overall the relationship has improved.
NGOs play a strong role in the diagnostic stage of the local plans.	NGOs need to play a greater role at all stages of planning, implementation and evaluation.

Achievements	Challenges
Provisions in the Constitution determine Provincial share of the fiscal envelop at 40 percent.	The existing Public Financial Management (PFM) regulations are not implemented, and provinces have no means to implement their plans. Dependency on donors will increase and de facto donors finance government functions.
Planification starts at the village level and therefore, a strong participatory and bottom-up approach has been implemented.	It is not clear who the beneficiaries are since they are multiple and at various levels, including groupement, sous-groupement and village. A danger is that the secteur will benefit more from the plan than others, and in particular when there are competing views over priorities.
Empowering local communities to express needs and plan accordingly. Development starts to be owned.	Although women's groups have been targeted, gender is not explicitly targeted in priorities, which could be a result of the absence of a poverty reduction orientation in the local development plans.
All activities are budgeted.	Cost estimates are not clear (costs per unit for example). Investment plans run the risk of insufficient recurrent costs (covered by the state or donor). Investments need to be complemented by recruiting HR and paying salaries.
Annual investment and development plans based on the medium term show that government is in charge and that support to the activities is coordinated by the authorities.	Mobilisation of resources is slow and low (between 15 to 30 percent of the total) which may affect the prioritization of sectors or activities and may affect the existing cohesion among members of the local development committee. Their own contributions are low, only 5 percent in Beni-Mbau.
Strong opportunities for coordination among donors and NGOs; avoiding duplication. Option of joint pilot projects.	Performance of the year 2010 in Beni-Mbau, for example, is low due to limited resources. The Chefferie which is being build with PADDL assistance is expected to be ready later this year.
Decentralised and deconcentrated levels of government can work jointly if roles and responsibilities are clearly defined.	Deconcentrated levels are responsible for 28 different services but it is not clear how they relate to other government entities. Remaining uncertainties over what competences will be transferred and what resources will become available.

Annex 4

Overview of UNDP's Contributions in the Access to Justice Programme: Sexual Violence

1. Significant technical and logistical strengthening of the capacity of the criminal justice system, including medical doctors, criminal police, judges, military tribunals, and prosecutors to accompany survivors of violence through the justice system.
2. Measures to strengthen the capacity of local NGOs (including legal aid clinics) to provide legal support, and to coordinate and standardize legal assistance. Efforts to re-establish the local population's faith in the justice system and address sexual violence as an unacceptable practice and a violation of human rights.
3. Monitoring of the entire penal process to ensure that cases are prepared in a timely and accurate fashion to meet quality and time deadlines for police reports, medical certificates and other documents to support the prosecution of cases of sexual violence.
4. Covering the costs, as needed, for transportation and room and board of survivors of sexual violence, and for those individuals associated with enabling the judiciary to handle cases within the stipulated timeframe.
5. In partnership with other agencies, developing and disseminating a sexual violence referral pathway in North and South Kivu, and in Ituri. This will likely further encourage women and girls to seek increased judicial redress for sexual violence and also augment their access to medical, psychosocial, socio-economic reinsertion support.

Overview of sexual violence cases addressed by the legal system in 2010 and 2011

The table above provides evidence that the aforementioned integrated and comprehensive approach is bearing fruit in terms of increased judicial and social redress for sexual violence. It highlights that in 2010, there were 182 complaints filed, 148 assisted, and more than 120 cases addressed by the legal system. In first part of 2011 alone, there were 189 cases registered and 178 cases assisted by the legal system. The number of cases addressed by the legal system in 2011 is not available.

In 2010 and 2011, sexual violence cases represent nearly 50 percent of the caseload of the courts, an indication that the project has significantly raised the profile of sexual violence by funding the basic functioning of the judicial system. This is a red flag that the overall capacity of the courts is quite weak and additional advocacy and resources for the judicial system are needed within efforts that fall under this outcome.

In addition to the aforementioned cases, support in 2010 for three extra-judicial, mobile hearings on sexual violence in North Kivu and Ituri encouraged the prosecution of 20 cases of rape, of which 11 guilty verdicts were returned in North Kivu, and 44 cases of rape were prosecuted with 16 resulting in a guilty verdict in Ituri. In 2011, UNDP supported an additional 6 extra-judicial hearings in which 52 cases of sexual violence were judged. No data are available on the number of guilty verdicts. These hearings, among them hearings for the mass rape of nearly 300 civilians by FDLR rebels and Congolese Mai-Mai fighters in Walikale in 2010, create an important precedent and send an important message to past and potential perpetrators of sexual violence from armed groups and the military.
